

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

3 1761 01630002 2

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

PHYSICS DEPARTMENT

RECEIVED

APR 10 1951

PHYSICS DEPARTMENT
5712 S. DICKINSON ST.
CHICAGO, ILL.

1951

PHYSICS DEPARTMENT

CHICAGO

PHYSICS DEPARTMENT

CHICAGO

PHYSICS DEPARTMENT

CHICAGO

PHYSICS DEPARTMENT

CHICAGO

LECTURES ON RHETORIC AND BELLES LETTRES.

By HUGH BLAIR, D.D. & F.R.S. Ed.

ONE OF THE MINISTERS OF THE HIGH CHURCH, AND
PROFESSOR OF RHETORIC AND BELLES LETTRES
IN THE UNIVERSITY, OF EDINBURGH.

Ballyvaughan Library

IN TWO VOLUMES.

VOL. II.

THIRTEENTH EDITION.

LONDON:

PRINTED FOR CADELL AND DAVIES; F. C. AND J. RIVINGTON; LONGMAN, HURST, REES, ORME, AND BROWN; J. AND A. ARCH; BALDWIN, CRADOCK, AND JOY; BLACK AND SON; AND G. AND W. B. WHIT-TAKER: AND A. CONSTABLE AND CO. AND J. FAIRBAIRN AT EDINBURGH.

1819.

REPRINTED

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO

1968

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY

PE
1402
B6
1819
V. 2

Printed by A. Surhan,
New-Street-Square, London.

CONTENTS

OF

THE SECOND VOLUME.

LECT.		Page
XXVII.	DIFFERENT Kinds of Public Speaking — Eloquence of Popular Assemblies — Extracts from Demosthenes.	1
XXVIII.	Eloquence of the Bar — Analysis of Cicero's Oration for Cluentius	29
XXIX.	Eloquence of the Pulpit	56
XXX.	Critical Examination of a Sermon of Bishop Atterbury's	82
XXXI.	Conduct of a Discourse in all its Parts — Introduction — Division — Narration and Explication	111
XXXII.	Conduct of a Discourse — The Argumentative Part — The Pathetic Part — The Peroration	134
XXXIII.	Pronunciation, or Delivery	157
XXXIV.	Means of improving in Eloquence	180
XXXV.	Comparative Merit of the Ancients and the Moderns — Historical Writing	199
XXXVI.	Historical Writing	220
XXXVII.	Philosophical Writing — Dialogue — Epistolary Writing — Fictitious History	243

LECT.		Page
XXXVIII.	Nature of Poetry — Its Origin and Progress — Versification	263
XXXIX.	Pastoral Poetry — Lyric Poetry	287
XL.	Didactic Poetry — Descriptive Poetry - - - - -	312
XLI.	The Poetry of the Hebrews - - - - -	335
XLII.	Epic Poetry - - - - -	357
XLIII.	Homer's Iliad and Odyssey — Virgil's Æneid - - - - -	378
XLIV.	Lucan's Pharsalia — Tasso's Je- rusalem — Camoens' Lusiad — Fenelon's Telemachus — Vol- taire's Henriade — Milton's Paradise Lost - - - - -	400
XLV.	Dramatic Poetry — Tragedy - - - - -	425
XLVI.	Tragedy — Greek — French — English Tragedy - - - - -	450
XLVII.	Comedy — Greek and Roman — French — English Comedy	476

LECTURE XXVII.

DIFFERENT KINDS OF PUBLIC SPEAKING—ELOQUENCE OF POPULAR ASSEMBLIES—EXTRACTS FROM DEMOSTHENES.

AFTER the preliminary views which have been given of the nature of Eloquence in general, and of the state in which it has subsisted in different ages and countries, I am now to enter on the consideration of the different kinds of Public Speaking, the distinguishing characters of each, and the rules which relate to them. The ancients divided all Orations into three kinds: the Demonstrative, the Deliberative, and the Judicial. The scope of the Demonstrative was to praise or to blame; that of the Deliberative, to advise or to dissuade; that of the Judicial, to accuse or to defend. The chief subjects of Demonstrative Eloquence, were Panegyrics, Invectives, Gratulatory and Funeral Orations. The Deliberative was employed in matters of public concern agitated in the Senate, or before the Assemblies of the People. The Judicial is the same with the Eloquence of the Bar, employed in addressing Judges, who have power to absolve or to condemn. This division runs through all the ancient Treatises on Rhetoric; and is followed by the moderns who copy them. It is a division not inartificial; and comprehends most, or all of the matters which can be the subject of Public Discourse. It will, however, suit our purpose better, and be found, I imagine, more useful, to follow that division, which the train of Modern Speaking naturally points out to us, taking from the three great scenes of Eloquence, Popular Assemblies, the Bar, and the Pulpit; each of which has a distinct character, that particularly suits it. This division coincides in part with the ancient one. The Eloquence of the Bar is precisely the same with what the ancients called the Judicial. The Eloquence of Popular Assemblies, though mostly of what they term the Deliberative Species, yet admits also of the Demonstrative. The Eloquence of the Pulpit is altogether of a distinct nature, and cannot be properly reduced under any of the heads of the ancient Rhetoricians.

To all the three, Pulpit, Bar, and Popular Assemblies, belong, in common, the rules, concerning the conduct of a discourse in all its parts. Of these rules I purpose afterwards to treat at large. But before proceeding to them, I intend to shew, first, what is peculiar to each of these three kinds of Oratory, in their spirit, character, or manner. For every species of Public Speaking has a manner or character peculiarly suited to it; of which it is highly material to have a just idea, in order to direct the application of general rules. The Eloquence of a Lawyer is fundamentally different from that of a Divine, or a Speaker in Parliament: and to have a precise and proper idea of the distinguishing character which any kind of Public Speaking requires, is the foundation of what is called a just taste in that kind of speaking.

Laying aside any question concerning the pre-eminence in point of rank, which is due to any one of the three kinds before mentioned, I shall begin with that which tends to throw most light upon the rest, viz. the Eloquence of Popular Assemblies. The most august Theatre for this kind of Eloquence, to be found in any nation of Europe, is, beyond doubt, the Parliament of Great Britain. In meetings too, of less dignity, it may display itself. Wherever there is a popular court, or wherever any number of men are assembled for debate or consultation, there, in different forms, this species of Eloquence may take place.

Its object is, or ought always to be, Persuasion. There must be some end proposed; some point, most commonly of public utility or good, in favour of which we seek to determine the hearers. Now, in all attempts to persuade men, we must proceed upon this principle, that it is necessary to convince their understanding. Nothing can be more erroneous, than to imagine, that, because Speeches to Popular Assemblies admit more of a declamatory Style than some other discourses, they therefore stand less in need of being supported by sound reasoning. When modelled upon this false idea, they may have the show, but never can produce the effect, of real Eloquence. Even the show of Eloquence which they make, will please only the trifling and superficial. For, with all tolerable judges, indeed almost with all men, mere declamation soon becomes insipid. Of whatever rank the hearers be, a Speaker is never to presume, that by a frothy and ostentatious harangue, without solid sense and argument, he can either make impression on them, or acquire fame to him.

self. It is, at least, a dangerous experiment; for, where such an artifice succeeds once, it will fail ten times. Even the common people are better judges of argument and good sense than we sometimes think them; and upon any question of business, a plain man, who speaks to the point, without art, will generally prevail over the most artful Speaker who deals in flowers and ornament, rather than in reasoning. Much more, when Public Speakers address themselves to any Assembly where there are persons of education and improved understanding, they ought to be careful not to trifle with their hearers.

Let it be ever kept in view, that the foundation of all that can be called Eloquence, is good sense, and solid thought. As popular as the Orations of Demosthenes were, spoken to all the citizens of Athens, every one who looks into them, must see how fraught they are with argument; and how important it appeared to him, to convince the understanding, in order to persuade, or to work on the principles of action. Hence their influence in his own time; hence their fame at this day. Such a pattern as this, Public Speakers ought to set before them for imitation, rather than follow the track of those loose and frothy Declaimers, who have brought discredit on Eloquence. Let it be their first study, in addressing any Popular Assembly, to be previously masters of the business on which they are to speak; to be well provided with matter and argument, and to rest upon these the chief stress. This will always give to their discourse an air of manliness and strength, which is a powerful instrument of persuasion. Ornament, if they have genius for it, will follow of course; at any rate it demands only their secondary study: "Cura “ sit verborum ; sollicitudo rerum :” — “ To your expression be attentive, but about your matter be solicitous,” is an advice of Quinctilian, which cannot be too often recollected by all who study Oratory.

In the next place, in order to be persuasive Speakers in a Popular Assembly, it is, in my opinion, a capital rule, that we be ourselves persuaded of whatever we recommend to others. Never, when it can be avoided, ought we to espouse any side of the argument, but what we believe to be the true and the right one. Seldom or never will a man be eloquent, but when he is in earnest, and uttering his own sentiments. They are only the “ veræ voces ab imo pectore,” the unassumed language of the heart or head, that carry the force of conviction. In a former Lecture, when entering on this subject, I observed, that all high Eloquence must be the offspring of passion, or warm emotion. It is this which makes every man persuasive; and gives a force to his genius, which it possesses at no other time. Under what disadvantage then is he placed, who, not feeling what he utters, must counterfeit a warmth to which he is a stranger?

I know, that young people, on purpose to train themselves to the Art of Speaking, imagine it useful to adopt that side of the question under debate, which, to themselves, appears the weakest, and to try what figure they can make upon it. But, I am afraid, this is not the most improving education for Public Speaking; and that it tends to form them to a habit of flimsy and trivial discourse. Such a liberty they should, at no time, allow themselves, unless in meetings where no real business is carried on, but where declamation and improvement in Speech is the sole aim. Nor even in such meetings, would I recommend it as the most useful exercise. They will improve themselves to more advantage, and acquit themselves with more honour, by chusing always that side of the debate to which, in their own judgment, they are most inclined, and supporting it by what seems to themselves most solid and persuasive. They will acquire the habit of reasoning closely, and expressing themselves with warmth and force, much more when they are adhering to their own sentiments, than when they are speaking in contradiction to them. In assemblies where any real business is carried on, whether that business be of much importance or not, it is always of dangerous consequence for young practitioners to make trial of this sort of play of Speech. It may fix an imputation on their characters before they are aware; and what they intended merely as amusement, may be turned to the discredit either of their principles or their understanding.

Debate, in Popular Courts, seldom allows the Speaker that full and accurate preparation beforehand, which the Pulpit always, and the Bar sometimes, admits. The arguments must be suited to the course which the Debate takes; and as no man can exactly foresee this, one who trusts to a set Speech, composed in his closet, will, on many occasions, be thrown out of the ground which he had taken. He will find it pre-occupied by others, or his reasonings superseded by some new turn of the business; and, if he ventures to use his prepared Speech, it will be frequently at the hazard of making an awkward figure. There is a general prejudice with us, and not wholly an unjust one, against set Speeches in Public Meetings. The only occasion, when they have any propriety, is, at the opening of a Debate, when the Speaker has it in his power to chuse his field. But as the Debate advances, and parties warm, discourses of this kind become more unsuitable. They want the native air, the appearance of being suggested by the business that is going on; study and ostentation are apt to be visible; and, of course, though applauded as elegant, they are seldom so persuasive as more free and unconstrained discourses.

This, however, does not by any means conclude against premeditation of what we are to say; the neglect of which, and the trusting wholly to extemporaneous efforts, will unavoidably produce the habit of speaking in a loose and undigested manner. But the premeditation which is of most advantage, in the case which we now consider, is of the subject or argument in general, rather than of nice composition in any particular branch of it. With regard to the matter, we cannot be too accurate in our preparation, so as to be fully masters of the business under consideration; but, with regard to words and expression, it is very possible so far to overdo, as to render our speech stiff and precise. Indeed, till once persons acquire that firmness, that presence of mind, and command of expression, in a Public Meeting, which nothing but habit and practice can bestow, it may be proper for a young Speaker to commit to memory the whole of what he is to say. But, after some performances of this kind have given him boldness, he will find it the better method not to confine himself so strictly, but only to write, beforehand, some sentences with which he intends to set out, in order to put himself fairly in the train; and for the rest, to set down short notes of the topics, or principal thoughts upon which he is to insist, in their order, leaving the words to be suggested by the warmth of discourse. Such short notes of the substance of the discourse will be found of considerable service to those especially who are beginning to speak in public. They will accustom them to some degree of accuracy, which, if they speak frequently, they are in danger too soon of losing. They will even accustom them to think more closely on the subject in question; and will assist them greatly in arranging their thoughts with method and order.

This leads me next to observe, that in all kinds of Public Speaking, nothing is of greater consequence than a proper and clear method. I mean not that formal method of laying down heads and subdivisions, which is commonly practised in the Pulpit; and which, in Popular Assemblies, unless the Speaker be a man of great authority and character, and the subject of great importance, and the preparation too very accurate, is rather in hazard of disgusting the hearers: such an introduction presenting always the melancholy prospect of a long discourse. But though the method be not laid down in form, no discourse of any length should be without method; that is, every thing should be found in its proper place. Every one who speaks will find it of the greatest advantage to himself to have previously arranged his thoughts, and classed under proper heads, in his own mind, what he is to deliver. This will assist his memory, and carry him through his discourse, without that confusion to which one is every moment subject, who has fixed no distinct plan of what he is to say. And with respect to the hearers, order in discourse is absolutely necessary for making any proper impression.

It adds both force and light to what is said. It makes them accompany the Speaker easily and readily, as he goes along; and makes them feel the full effect of every argument which he employs. Few things, therefore, deserve more to be attended to than distinct arrangement: for Eloquence, however great, can never produce entire conviction without it. Of the rules of method, and the proper distribution of the several parts of a discourse, I am hereafter to treat.

Let us now consider the Style and Expression suited to the Eloquence of Popular Assemblies. Beyond doubt, these give scope for the most animated manner of Public Speaking. The very aspect of a large Assembly, engaged in some debate of moment, and attentive to the discourse of one man, is sufficient to inspire that man with such elevation and warmth, as both gives rise to strong impressions, and gives them propriety. Passion easily rises in a great Assembly, where the movements are communicated by mutual sympathy between the Orator and the Audience. Those bold figures, of which I treated formerly as the native language of passion, have then their proper place. That ardour of Speech, that vehemence and glow of Sentiment, which arise from a mind animated and inspired by some great and public object, form the peculiar characteristics of Popular Eloquence, in its highest degree of perfection.

The liberty, however, which we are now giving of the strong and passionate manner to this kind of Oratory, must be always understood with certain limitations and restraints, which it will be necessary to point out distinctly, in order to guard against dangerous mistakes on this subject.

As first, The warmth which we express must be suitèd to the occasion and the subject: for nothing can be more preposterous, than an attempt to introduce great vehemence into a subject, which is either of slight importance, or which, by its nature, requires to be treated of calmly. A temperate tone of Speech, is that for which there is most frequent occasion; and he who is, on every subject, passionate and vehement, will be considered as a blusterer, and meet with little regard.

In the second place, We must take care never to counterfeit warmth without feeling it. This always betrays persons into an unnatural manner, which exposes them to ridicule. For, as I have often suggested, to support the appearance without the real feeling of passion, is one of the most difficult things in nature. The disguise can almost never be so perfect, as not to be discovered. The heart can only answer to the heart. The great rule here, as indeed in every other case, is, to follow nature: never to attempt a strain of Eloquence which is not seconded by our own genius. One may be a Speaker, both of much reputation and much influence, in the calm argumentative manner. To attain the pathetic, and the sublime of Oratory, requires those strong sensibilities of mind, and that high power of expression, which are given to few.

In the third place, Even when the subject justifies the vehement manner, and when genius prompts it; when warmth is felt, not counterfeited; we must, still, set a guard on ourselves, not to allow impetuosity to transport us too far. Without emotion in the Speaker, Eloquence, as was before observed, will never produce its highest effects; but, at the same time, if the Speaker lose command of himself, he will soon lose command of his audience too. He must never kindle too soon : he must begin with moderation ; and study to carry his hearers along with him, as he warms in the progress of his discourse. For, if he runs before in the course of passion, and leaves them behind ; if they are not tuned, if we may speak so, in unison to him, the discord will presently be felt, and be very grating. Let a Speaker have ever so good reason to be animated and fired by his subject, it is always expected of him, that the awe and regard due to his Audience should lay a decent restraint upon his warmth, and prevent it from carrying him beyond certain bounds. If, when most heated by the subject, he can be so far master of himself as to preserve close attention to argument, and even to some degree of correct expression, this self-command, this exertion of reason, in the midst of passion, has a wonderful effect both to please and to persuade. It is indeed the master-piece, the highest attainment of Eloquence ; uniting the strength of reason with the vehemence of passion ; affording all the advantages of passion for the purpose of persuasion, without the confusion and disorder which are apt to accompany it.

In the fourth place, In the highest and most animated strain of Popular Speaking, we must always preserve regard to what the public ear will bear. This direction I give, in order to guard against an injudicious imitation of ancient Orators, who, both in their pronounciation and gesture, and in their figures of expression, used a bolder manner than what the greater coolness of modern taste will readily suffer. This may perhaps, as I formerly observed, be a disadvantage to Modern Eloquence. It is no reason why we should be too severe in checking the impulse of genius, and continue always creeping on the ground; but it is a reason, however, why we should avoid carrying the tone of declamation to a height that would now be reckoned extravagant. Demosthenes, to justify the unsuccessful action of Cheronæa, calls up the manes of those heroes who fell in the battle of Marathon and Plataea, and swears by them, that their fellow-citizens had done well in their endeavours to support the same cause. Cicero, in his Oration for Milo, implores and obtests the Alban hills and groves, and makes a long address to them: and both passages, in these Orators, have a fine effect.* But how few modern Orators could venture on such apostrophes? and what a power of genius would it require to give such figures now their proper grace, or make them produce a due effect upon the hearers?

In the fifth and last place, In all kinds of Public

* The passage in Cicero is very beautiful, and adorned with the highest colouring of his Eloquence. “ Non est humano consilio, ne mediocri quidem, Judices, deorum immortalium cura, res illa perfecta. Religiones, mehercule, ipsæ aræque cum illam belluam cadere viderunt, commovisse se videntur, et jus in illo suum retinuisse. Vos enim jam Albani tumuli, atque luci vos inquam imploro atque obtestor, vosque Albanorum obrutæ aræ, sacrorum populi Romani sociæ et equales, quas ille præceps amentia, cæsis prostratisque, sanctissimis lucis, substructionum insanis molibus oppresserat; vestræ tum aræ, vestræ religiones viguerunt, vestra vis valuit, quam ille omni scelere polluerat. Tuque ex tuo edito monte Latiali, sancte Jupiter, cujus ille lacus, nemora, finesque, sæpe omni nefario stupro, scelere maculat, aliquando ad eum puniendum, oculos aperuisti; vobis illæ, vobis vestro in conspectu, seræ, sed justæ tamen, & debitæ pœnæ solutæ sunt.”

Speaking, but especially in Popular Assemblies, it is a capital rule to attend to all the decorums of time, place, and character. No warmth of Eloquence can atone for the neglect of these. That vehemence, which is becoming in a person of character and authority, may be unsuitable to the modesty expected from a young Speaker. That sportive and witty manner which may suit one subject and one assembly, is altogether out of place in a grave cause and a solemn meeting. "Caput artis est," says Quintilian, "decere." — "The first principle of art, is, to observe "decorum." No one should ever rise to speak in public, without forming to himself a just and strict idea of what suits his own age and character; what suits the subject, the hearers, the place, the occasion; and adjusting the whole train and manner of his speaking on this idea. All the ancients insist much on this. Consult the first chapter of the eleventh book of Quintilian, which is employed wholly on this point, and is full of good sense. Cicero's admonitions in his Orator ad Brutum, I shall give in his own words, which should never be forgotten by any who speak in public. "Est Eloquentiæ, sicut reli-
"quarum rerum, fundamentum, sapientiã; ut enim
"in vita, sic in oratione nihil est difficilius quam quod
"deceat videre; hujus ignoratione sæpissimè pec-
"catur; non enim omnis fortuna, non omnis aucto-
"ritas, non omnis ætas, nec vero locus, aut tempus,
"aut auditor omnis, eodem aut verborum genere
"tractandus est, aut sententiarum. Semperque in "omni parte orationis, ut vitæ, quid deceat consider-
"andum; quod et in re de qua agitur positum est,
"et in personis et eorum qui dicunt, et eorum qui “ audiunt.”* — So much for the considerations that require to be attended to, with respect to the vehemence and warmth which is allowed in Popular Eloquence.

The current of Style should in general be full, free, and natural. Quaint and artificial expressions are out of place here; and always derogate from persuasion. It is a strong and manly style which should chiefly be studied; and metaphorical Language, when properly introduced, produces often a happy effect. When the metaphors are warm, glowing, and descriptive, some inaccuracy in them will be overlooked, which, in a written composition, would be remarked and censured. Amidst the torrent of declamation, the strength of the figure makes impression; the inaccuracy of it escapes.

With regard to the degree of conciseness or diffuseness, suited to Popular Eloquence, it is not easy to fix any exact bounds. I know that it is common to recommend a diffuse manner as the most proper. I am inclined, however, to think, that there is danger of erring in this respect; and that by indulging too much in the diffused Style, Public Speakers often lose more in point of strength, than they gain by the fulness of their illustration. There is no doubt, that in speaking to a multitude, we must not speak in sentences and apophthegms: care must be taken to explain and to inculcate; but this care may be, and frequently is, carried too far. We ought always to remember, that how much soever we may be pleased with hearing ourselves speak, every audience is very ready to be tired; and the moment they begin to be tired, all our Eloquence goes for nothing. A loose and verbose manner never fails to create disgust; and, on most occasions, we had better run the risk of saying too little than too much. Better place our thought in one strong point of view, and rest it there, than by turning it into every light, and pouring forth a profusion of words upon it, exhaust the attention of our hearers, and leave them flat and languid.

* “ Good sense is the foundation of Eloquence, as it is of all other things that are valuable. It happens in Oratory exactly as it does in life, that frequently nothing is more difficult than to discern what is proper and becoming. In consequence of mistaking this, the grossest faults are often committed. For to the different degrees of rank, fortune, and age among men to all the varieties of time, place, and auditory, the same Style of Language, and the same strain of thought cannot agree. In every part of a discourse, just as in every part of life, we must attend to what is suitable and decent; whether that be determined by the nature of the subject of which we treat, or by the characters of those who speak, or of those who hear.”

Of Pronunciation and Delivery, I am hereafter to treat apart. At present it is sufficient to observe that in speaking to mixt Assemblies, the best manner of delivery is the firm and the determined. An arrogant and overbearing manner is indeed always disagreeable; and the least appearance of it ought to be shunned: but there is a certain decisive tone, which may be assumed even by a modest man, who is thoroughly persuaded of the sentiments he utters; and which is best calculated for making a general impression. A feeble and hesitating manner bespeaks always some distrust of a man's own opinion; which is, by no means, a favourable circumstance for his inducing others to embrace it.

These are the chief thoughts which have occurred to me from reflection and observation, concerning the peculiar distinguishing characters of the Eloquence proper for Popular Assemblies. The sum of what has been said, is this: The end of Popular Speaking is persuasion; and this must be founded on conviction. Argument and reasoning must be the basis, if we would be Speakers of business, and not mere declaimers. We should be engaged in earnest on the side which we espouse; and utter, as much as possible, our own, and not counterfeited Sentiments. The premeditation should be of things, rather than of words. Clear order and method should be studied; the manner and expression warm and animated; though still, in the midst of that vehemence, which may at times be suitable, carried on under the proper restraints which regard to the audience, and to the decorum of character, ought to lay on every Public Speaker: the Style free and easy; strong and descriptive, rather than diffuse; and the delivery determined and firm. To conclude this head, let every Orator remember, that the impression made by fine and artful speaking is momentary; that made by argument and good sense, is solid and lasting.

I shall now, that I may afford an exemplification of that species of Oratory of which I have been treating, insert some extracts from Demosthenes. Even under the great disadvantage of an English translation, they will exhibit a small specimen of that vigorous and spirited Eloquence which I have so often praised. I shall take my extracts mostly from the Philippics and Olynthiacs, which were entirely popular Orations spoken to the general convention of the citizens of Athens: and, as the subject of both the Philippics and the Olynthiacs is the same, I shall not confine myself to one Oration, but shall join together passages taken from two or three of them; such as may shew his general strain of speaking, on some of the chief branches of the subject. The subject in general is, to rouse the Athenians to guard against Philip of Macedon, whose growing power and crafty policy had by that time endangered, and soon after overwhelmed the liberties of Greece. The Athenians began to be alarmed; but their deliberations were slow, and their measures feeble; several of their favourite Orators having been gained by Philip's bribes to favour his cause. In this critical conjuncture of affairs Demosthenes arose. In the following manner he begins his first Philippic; which, like the exordiums of all his Orations, is simple and artless.*

“ Had we been convened, Athenians! on some “ new subject of debate, I had waited till most of “ your usual counsellors had declared their opinions.
“ If I had approved of what was proposed by them,
“ I should have continued silent; if not, I should “ then have attempted to speak my sentiments. But “ since those very points on which these Speakers “ have oftentimes been heard already, are at this “ time to be considered; though I have arisen first,
“ I presume I may expect your pardon; for if they
“ on former occasions had advised the proper “ measures, you would not have found it needful to “ consult at present.

* In the following extracts, Leland's translation is mostly followed.

“ First then, Athenians! however wretched the “ situation of our affairs at present seems, it must “ not by any means be thought desperate. What I “ am now going to advance may possibly appear a “ paradox; yet it is a certain truth, that our past “ misfortunes afford a circumstance most favourable
 “ to our future hopes.* And what is that? even “ that our present difficulties are owing entirely to “ our total indolence and utter disregard of our own “ interest. For were we thus situated, in spite of “ every effort which our duty demanded, then indeed
 “ we might regard our fortunes as absolutely despe“ rate. But now, Philip hath only conquered your “ supineness and inactivity; the state he hath not “ conquered. You cannot be said to be defeated;
 “ your force hath never been exerted.

“ If there is a man in this assembly who thinks “ that we must find a formidable enemy in Philip,
 “ while he views on one hand the numerous armies
 “ which surround him, and on the other, the weak“ ness of our state, despoiled of so much of its “ dominions, I cannot deny that he thinks justly.
 “ Yet let him reflect on this; there was a time, Athe“ nians! when we possessed Pydna, Potidœa, and “ Melthone, and all that country round; when many “ of the states, now subjected to him, were free, and “ independent, and more inclined to our alliance
 “ than to his. If Philip, at that time weak in him“ self, and without allies, had desponded of success

* This thought is only hinted in the first Philippic, but brought out more fully in the third; as the same thoughts, occasioned by similar situations of affairs, sometimes occur in the different orations on this subject.

“ against you, he would never have engaged in those “ enterprises which are now crowned with success, “ nor could have raised himself to that pitch of “ grandeur at which you now behold him. But he “ knew well that the strongest places are only prizes “ laid between the combatants, and ready for the “ conqueror. He knew that the dominions of the “ absent devolve naturally to those who are in the “ field; the possessions of the supine, to the active “ and intrepid. Animated by these sentiments he “ overturns whole nations. He either rules univer“ sally as a conqueror, or governs as a protector. For “ mankind naturally seek confederacy with such, as “ they see resolved and preparing not to be wanting “ to themselves.

“ If you, my countrymen! will now at length be “ persuaded to entertain the like sentiments; if each “ of you will be disposed to approve himself an use“ ful citizen, to the utmost that his station and abi“ lities enable him; if the rich will be ready to con“ tribute, and the young to take the field; in one “ word, if you will be yourselves, and banish these “ vain hopes which every single person entertains, “ that the active part of public business may lie upon “ others, and he remain at his ease; you may then,
“ by the assistance of the Gods, recal those oppor“ tunities which your supineness hath neglected, “ regain your dominions, and chastise the insolence
“ of this man.

“ But when, O my countrymen! will you begin to “ exert your vigour? Do you wait till roused by “ some dire event? till forced by some necessity?
“ What then are we to think of our present condi“ tion? To free men, the disgrace attending on mis“ conduct is, in my opinion, the most urgent neces“ sity. Or say, is it your sole ambition to wander “ through the public places, each inquiring of the “ other, “ What new advices?” Can any thing be “ more new than that a man of Macedon should “ conquer the Athenians, and give law to Greece?

“ ‘ Is Philip dead?’ ‘ No — but he is sick.’ Pray,
“ what is it to you whether Philip is sick or not?
“ Supposing he should die, you would raise up “ another Philip, if you continue thus regardless of “ your interest.

“ Many, I know, delight more in nothing than in “ circulating all the rumours they hear as articles of “ intelligence. Some cry, Philip hath joined with “ the Lacedæmonians, and they are concerting the “ destruction of Thebes. Others assure us, he hath “ sent an embassy to the king of Persia; others, that “ he is fortifying places in Illyria. Thus we all go “ about framing our several tales. I do believe, “ indeed, Athenians! that he is intoxicated with his “ greatness, and does entertain his imagination with “ many such visionary projects, as he sees no power “ rising to oppose him. But I cannot be persuaded “ that he hath so taken his measures, that the “ weakest amongst us (for the weakest they are who “ spread such rumours) know what he is next to do.
“ Let us disregard these tales. Let us only be per“ suaded of this, that he is our enemy; that we have “ long been subject to his insolence; that whatever
“ we expected to have been done for us by others, “ hath turned against us; that all the resource left,
“ is in ourselves; and that if we are not inclined to “ carry our arms abroad, we should be forced to “ engage him at home. Let us be persuaded of “ these things, and then we shall come to a proper “ determination, and be no longer guided by “ rumours. We need not be solicitous to know what “ particular events are to happen. We may be well “ assured that nothing good can happen, unless we “ give due attention to our own affairs, and act as “ becomes Athenians.

“ Were it a point generally acknowledged *, that “ Philip is now at actual war with the state, the only “ thing under deliberation would then be, how to “ oppose him with most safety. But since there are “ persons so strangely infatuated, that although he “ has already possessed himself of a considerable “ part of our dominions; although he is still extend“ ing his conquests; although all Greece has suffered “ by his injustice; yet they can hear it repeated in “ this Assembly, that it is some of us who seek to “ embroil the state in war: this suggestion must first “ be guarded against. I readily admit, that were it “ in our power to determine whether we should be at “ peace or war, peace, if it depended on our option, “ is most desirable to be embraced. But if the other “ party hath drawn the sword, and gathered his “ armies round him; if he amuses us with the name “ of peace, while, in fact, he is proceeding to the “ greatest hostilities; what is left for us but to “ oppose him? If any man takes that for a peace, “ which is only a preparation for his leading his “ forces directly upon us, after his other conquests,
“ I hold that man’s mind to be disordered. At least,
“ it is only our conduct towards Philip, not Philip’s

* Phil. iii.

“ conduct towards us, that is to be termed a peace;
 “ and this is the peace for which Philip’s treasures
 “ are expended, for which his gold is so liberally “ scattered among our venal orators, that he may be “ at liberty to carry on the war against you, while “ you make no war on him.

“ Heavens! is there any man of a right mind who “ would judge of peace or war by words, and not by “ actions? Is there any man so weak as to imagine “ that it is for the sake of those paltry villages of “ Thrace, Drongylus, and Cabyle, and Mastira, that “ Philip is now braving the utmost dangers, and “ enduring the severity of toils and seasons; and “ that he has no designs upon the arsenals, and the “ navies, and the silver mines of Athens? or that “ he will take up his winter quarters among the cells
 “ and dungeons of Thrace, and leave you to enjoy
 “ all your revenues in peace? But you wait perhaps “ till he declare war against you. — He will never do “ so — no, though he were at your gates. He will “ still be assuring you that he is not at war. Such “ were his professions to the people of Oreum, when “ his forces were in the heart of their country; such “ his professions to those of Pheræ, until the moment “ he attacked their walls; and thus he amused the “ Olynthians till he came within a few miles of them, “ and then he sent them a message, that either they “ must quit their city, or he his kingdom. He would “ indeed be the absurdest of mankind, if, while you “ suffer his outrages to pass unnoticed, and are “ wholly engaged in accusing and prosecuting one “ another, he should, by declaring war, put an end
 “ to your private contests, warn you to direct all “ your zeal against him, and deprive his pensioners

“ of their most specious pretence for suspending “ your resolutions, that of his not being at war with “ the state. I, for my part, hold and declare, that
“ by his attack of the Megaræans, by his attempts “ upon the liberty of Eubœa, by his late incursions
“ into Thrace, by his practices in Peloponnesus, “ Philip has violated the treaty; he is in a state of “ hostility with you; unless you shall affirm, that he “ who prepares to besiege a city, is still at peace, “ until the walls be actually invested. The man “ whose designs, whose whole conduct tends to “ reduce me to subjection, that man is at war with “ me, though not a blow hath yet been given, nor a “ sword drawn.

“ All Greece, all the barbarian world, is too nar“ row for this man’s ambition. And, though we “ Greeks see and hear all this, we send no embas“ sies to each other; we express no resentment; but “ into such wretchedness are we sunk, that even to “ this day we neglect what our interest and duty “ demand. Without engaging in associations, or “ forming confederacies, we look with unconcern
“ upon Philip’s growing power; each fondly imagin“ ing, that the time in which another is destroyed, “ is so much time gained to him; although no man
“ can be ignorant, that, like the regular periodical “ return of a fever, he is coming upon those who “ think themselves the most remote from danger.—
“ And what is the cause of our present passive dis“ position? For some cause sure there must be, why
“ the Greeks, who have been so zealous heretofore
“ in defence of liberty, are now so prone to slavery.
“ The cause, Athenians! is, that a principle, which “ was formerly fixed in the minds of all, now exists

“ no more ; a principle which conquered the opul-“ lence of Persia, maintained the freedom of Greece,
“ and triumphed over the powers of sea and land.
“ That principle was, an unanimous abhorrence of “ all those who accepted bribes from princes, that “ were enemies to the liberties of Greece. To be “ convicted of bribery, was then a crime altogether “ unpardonable. Neither Orators, nor Generals, “ would then sell for gold the favourable conjunctures
“ which fortune put into their hands. No gold “ could impair our firm concord at home, our hatred
“ and diffidence of tyrants and barbarians. But now
“ all things are exposed to sale, as in a public mar“ ket. Corruption has introduced such manners as “ have proved the bane and destruction of our coun“ try. Is a man known to have received foreign “ money? People envy him. Does he own it? They “ laugh. Is he convicted in form? They forgive “ him : so universally has this contagion diffused “ itself among us.

“ If there be any who, though not carried away
“ by bribes, yet are struck with terror, as if Philip “ was something more than human, they may see,
“ upon a little consideration, that he hath exhausted
“ all those artifices to which he owes his present ele“ vation ; and that his affairs are now ready to “ decline. For I myself, Athenians ! should think “ Philip really to be dreaded, if I saw him raised by “ honourable means.—When forces join in harmony
“ and affection, and one common interest unites “ confederating powers, then they share the toils
“ with alacrity, and endure distresses with persever“ ance. But when extravagant ambition and lawless “ power, as in the case of Philip, have aggrandized

“ a single person, the first pretence, the slightest “ accident, overthrows him, and dashes his greatness
“ to the ground. For, it is not possible, Athenians!
“ it is not possible, to found a lasting power upon “ injustice, perjury, and treachery. These may per“ haps succeed for once, and borrow for a while,
“ from hope, a gay and flourishing appearance. But “ time betrays their weakness, and they fall of them“ selves to ruin. For, as in structures of every kind,
“ the lower parts should have the firmest stability, so
“ the grounds and principles of great enterprises “ should be justice and truth. But this solid found“ ation is wanting to all the enterprises of Philip.

“ Hence, among his confederates, there are many “ who hate, who distrust, who envy him. If you “ will exert yourselves, as your honour and your “ interest require, you will not only discover the “ weakness and insincerity of his confederates, but “ the ruinous condition also of his own kingdom.
“ For you are not to imagine, that the inclinations “ of his subjects are the same with those of their “ prince. He thirsts for glory; but they have no “ part in this ambition. Harassed by those various “ excursions he is ever making, they groan under “ perpetual calamity; torn from their business and “ their families; and beholding commerce excluded
“ from their coasts. All those glaring exploits, “ which have given him his apparent greatness, have “ wasted his natural strength, his own kingdom, and “ rendered it much weaker than it originally was.
“ Besides, his profligacy and baseness, and those “ troops of buffoons, and dissolute persons, whom he “ caresses and keeps constantly about him, are, to “ men of just discernment, great indications of the “ weakness of his mind. At present, his successes “ cast a shade over these things; but let his arms “ meet with the least disgrace, his feebleness will “ appear, and his character be exposed. For, as in “ our bodies, while a man is in apparent health, the “ effect of some inward debility, which has been “ growing upon him, may, for a time, be concealed;

“ but, as soon as it comes the length of disease, all
“ his secret infirmities shew themselves in whatever “ part of his frame the disorder is lodged: so, in “ states and monarchies, while they carry on a war “ abroad, many defects escape the general eye; but,
“ as soon as war reaches their own territory, their “ infirmities come forth to general observation.

“ Fortune has great influence in all human affairs;
“ but I, for my part, should prefer the fortune of “ Athens, with the least degree of vigour in asserting “ your cause, to this man’s fortune. For we have “ many better reasons to depend upon the favour of “ Heaven than this man. But, indeed, he who will “ not exert his own strength, hath no title to depend “ either on his friends, or on the Gods. Is it at all “ surprising that he, who is himself ever amidst the “ labours and dangers of the field: who is every “ where; whom no opportunity escapes; to whom “ no season is unfavourable; should be superior to “ you, who are wholly engaged in contriving delays,
“ and framing decrees, and inquiring after news?
“ The contrary would be much more surprising, if “ we, who have never hitherto acted as became a “ state engaged in war, should conquer one who “ acts, in every instance, with indefatigable vigilance:
“ It is this, Athenians! it is this which gives him
“ all his advantage against you. Philip, constantly “ surrounded by his troops, and perpetually engaged “ in projecting his designs, can, in a moment, strike

 “ the blow where he pleases. But we, when any “ accident alarms us, first appoint our Trierarchs;
 “ then we allow them to exchange by substitution:
 “ then the supplies are considered; next, we resolve
 “ to man our fleet with strangers and foreigners;
 “ then find it necessary to supply their place our“ selves. In the midst of these delays, what we are “ failing to defend, the enemy is already master of;
 “ for the time of action is spent by us in preparing;
 “ and the issues of war will not wait for our slow
 “ and irresolute measures.

“ Consider then your present situation, and make “ such provision as the urgent danger requires. Talk
 “ not of your ten thousands, or your twenty thousand “ foreigners; of those armies which appear so mag“ nificent on paper only; great and terrible in your “ decrees, in execution weak and contemptible.
 “ But let your army be made up chiefly of the “ native forces of the state; let it be an Athenian “ strength to which you are to trust; and whom“ soever you appoint as general, let them be entirely “ under his guidance and authority. For, ever since “ our armies have been formed of foreigners alone;
 “ their victories have been gained over our allies “ and confederates only, while our enemies have “ risen to an extravagance of power.”

The Orator goes on to point out the number of forces which should be raised; the places of their destination; the season of the year in which they should set out; and then proposes in form his motion, as we would call it, or his decree, for the necessary supply of money, and for ascertaining the funds from which it should be raised. Having finished all that relates to the business under deliberation, he concludes these Orations on public affairs, commonly with no longer peroration than the following, which terminates the First Philippic: “ I, for my part, “ have never, upon any occasion, chosen to court “ your favour, by speaking any thing but what I “ was convinced would serve you. And, on this “ occasion, you have heard my sentiments freely “ declared, without art, and without reserve. I “ should have been pleased, indeed, that, as it is for “ your advantage, to have your true interest laid “ before you, so I might have been assured, that “ he who layeth it before you would share the “ advantage. But, uncertain as I know the conse- “ quence to be with respect to myself, I yet deter- “ mined to speak, because I was convinced that “ these measures, if pursued, must prove beneficial “ to the Public. And, of all those opinions which “ shall be offered to your acceptance, may the Gods “ determine that to be chosen which will best “ advance the general welfare.”

These Extracts may serve to give some imperfect idea of the manner of Demosthenes. For a juster and more complete one, recourse must be had to the excellent original.

LECTURE XXVIII.

ELOQUENCE OF THE BAR—ANALYSIS OF CICERO'S ORATION FOR CLUENTIUS.

I TREATED, in the last Lecture, of what is peculiar to the Eloquence of Popular Assemblies. Much of what was said on that head is applicable to the Eloquence of the Bar, the next great scene of Public Speaking to which I now proceed, and my observations upon which will therefore be the shorter. All, however, that was said in the former Lecture must not be applied to it; and it is of importance, that I begin with shewing where the distinction lies.

In the first place, the ends of speaking at the Bar, and in Popular Assemblies, are commonly different. In Popular Assemblies, the great object is persuasion; the Orator aims at determining the hearers to some choice or conduct, as good, fit, or useful. For accomplishing this end, it is incumbent on him to apply himself to all the principles of action in our nature; to the passions and to the heart, as well as to the understanding. But, at the Bar, conviction is the great object. There, it is not the Speaker's business to persuade the Judges to what is good or useful, but to shew them what is just and true; and, of course, it is chiefly, or solely, to the understanding that his Eloquence is addressed. This is a characteristical difference which ought ever to be kept in view.

In the next place, Speakers at the Bar address themselves to one, or to a few Judges, and these, too, persons generally of age, gravity, and authority of character. There they have not those advantages which a mixed and numerous Assembly affords for employing all the arts of Speech, even supposing their subject to admit them. Passion does not rise so easily; the Speaker is heard more coolly; he is watched over more severely; and would expose himself to ridicule, by attempting that high vehement tone, which is only proper in speaking to a multitude.

In the last place, the nature and management of the subjects which belong to the Bar, require a very different species of Oratory from that of Popular Assemblies. In the latter, the Speaker has a much wider range. He is seldom confined to any precise rule; he can fetch his topics from a great variety of quarters; and employ every illustration which his fancy or imagination suggests. But, at the bar, the field of speaking is limited to precise law and statute. Imagination is not allowed to take its scope. The Advocate has always lying before him the line, the square, and the compass. These, it is his principal business to be continually applying to the subjects under debate.

For these reasons, it is clear, that the Eloquence of the Bar is of a much more limited, more sober and chastened kind, than that of Popular Assemblies; and, for similar reasons, we must beware of considering even the judicial Orations of Cicero or Demosthenes as exact models of the manner of Speaking; which is adapted to the present state of the Bar. It is necessary to warn young Lawyers of this; because, though these were pleadings spoken in civil or criminal causes, yet, in fact, the nature of the Bar anciently, both in Greece and Rome, allowed a much nearer approach to Popular Eloquence, than what it now does. This was owing chiefly to two causes.

First, Because in the ancient Judicial Orations, strict law was much less an object of attention than it is become among us. In the days of Demosthenes and Cicero, the municipal statutes were few, simple, and general; and the decision of causes was trusted, in a great measure, to the equity and common sense of the Judges. Eloquence, much more than Jurisprudence, was the study of those who were to plead causes. Cicero somewhere says, that three months study was sufficient to make any man a complete Civilian; nay, it was thought that one might be a good pleader at the Bar, who had never studied law at all. For there were among the Romans a set of men called Pragmatici, whose office it was to give the Orator all the law knowledge which the cause he was to plead required, and which he put into that popular form, and dressed up with those colours of Eloquence, that were best fitted for influencing the Judges before whom he spoke.

We may observe next, that the Civil and Criminal Judges, both in Greece and Rome, were commonly much more numerous than they are with us, and formed a sort of Popular Assembly. The renowned tribunal of the Areopagus at Athens consisted of fifty Judges at the least.* Some make it to consist of a great many more. When Socrates was condemned, by what court it is uncertain, we are informed that no fewer than 280 voted against him. In Rome, the Prætor, who was the proper Judge both in civil and criminal causes, named for every cause of moment, the Judices Selecti, as they were called, who were always numerous, and had the office and power of both Judge and Jury. In the famous cause of Milo, Cicero spoke to fifty-one Judices Selecti, and so had the advantage of addressing his whole pleading, not to one or a few learned Judges of the point of law, as is the case with us, but to an Assembly of Roman Citizens. Hence all those arts of Popular Eloquence, which we find the Roman Orator so frequently employing, and probably with much success. Hence tears and commiseration are so often made use of as the instruments of gaining a cause. Hence certain practices, which would be reckoned theatrical among us, were common at the Roman Bar; such as introducing not only the accused person dressed in deep mourning, but presenting to the Judges his family, and his young children, endeavouring to move them by their cries and tears.

* Vide Potter, Antiq. vol. i. p. 102.

For these reasons, on account of the wide difference between the ancient and modern state of the Bar, to which we may add also the difference in the turn of ancient and modern Eloquence, which I formerly took notice of, too strict an imitation of Cicero's manner of pleading would now be extremely injudicious. To great advantage he may still be studied by every Speaker at the Bar. In the address with which he opens his subject, and the insinuation he employs for gaining the favour of the Judges; in the distinct arrangement of his facts; in the gracefulness of his narration; in the conduct and exposition of his arguments, he may and he ought to be imitated. A higher pattern cannot be set before us; but one who should imitate him also in his exaggeration and amplifications, in his diffuse and pompous declamation, and in his attempts to raise passion, would now make himself almost as ridiculous at the Bar, as if he should appear there in the Toga of a Roman Lawyer.

Before I descend to more particular directions concerning the Eloquence of the Bar, I must be allowed to take notice, that the foundation of a Lawyer's reputation and success must always be laid in a profound knowledge of his own profession. Nothing is of such consequence to him, or deserves more his deep and serious study. For whatever his abilities as a Speaker may be, if his knowledge of the law be reckoned superficial, few will chuse to commit their cause to him. Besides previous study, and a proper stock of knowledge attained, another thing highly material to the success of every Pleader, is a diligent and painful attention to every cause with which he is entrusted, so as to be thoroughly master of all the facts and circumstances relating to it. On this the ancient Rhetoricians insist with great earnestness, and justly represent it as a necessary basis to all the Eloquence that can be exerted in pleading. Cicero tells us (under the character of Antonius, in the second book De Oratore), that he always conversed at full length with every client who came to consult him; that he took care there should be no witness to their conversation, in order that his client might explain himself more freely; that he was wont to start every objection, and to plead the cause of the adverse party with him, that he might come at the whole truth, and be fully prepared on every point of the business; and that, after the client had retired, he used to balance all the facts with himself, under three different characters, his own, that of the Judge, and that of the Advocate on the opposite side. He censures very severely those of the profession who declined taking so much trouble; taxing them not only with shameful negligence, but with dishonesty and breach of* trust. To the same purpose Quinctilian, in the eighth chapter of his last book, delivers a great many excellent rules concerning all the methods which a Lawyer should employ for attaining the most thorough knowledge of the cause he is to plead; again and again recommending patience and attention in conversation with clients, and observing very sensibly, “ Non tam “ obest audire supervacua, quam ignorare necessaria.

 “ Frequenter enim et vulnus, et remedium, in iis “ Orator inveniet quæ litigatori in neutram partem, “ habere momentum videbantur.” †

* “ Equidem soleo dare operam, ut de sua quisque re mi ipse “ doceat; et nequis alius adsit, quo liberius loquatur; et agere “ adversarii causam, ut ille agat suam; et quicquid de sua re “ cogitaret, in medium proferat. Itaque cum ille decessit, tres “ personas unus sustineo, summâ animi equitate; meam, adversarii, “ judicis. — Nonnulli dum operam suam multam existimari volunt, “ ut toto foro volitare, et a causa ad causam ire videantur, causas “ dicunt incognitas. In quo est illa quidem magna offensio, vel “ negligentia susceptis rebus, vel perfidia receptis; sed etiam illa, “ major opinione, quod nemo potest de ea re quam non novit,
 “ non turpissimè dicere.”

† “ To listen to something that is superfluous can do no hurt; “ whereas to be ignorant of something that is material, may be “ highly prejudicial. The advocate will frequently discover the

Supposing an Advocate to be thus prepared, with all the knowledge which the study of the law in general, and of that cause which he is to plead in particular, can furnish him, I must next observe, that Eloquence in pleading is of the highest moment for giving support to a cause. It were altogether wrong to infer, that because the ancient popular and vehement manner of pleading is now in a great measure superseded, there is, therefore, no room for Eloquence at the Bar, and that the study of it is become superfluous. Though the manner of speaking be changed, yet still there is a right and a proper manner, which deserves to be studied as much as ever. Perhaps there is no scene of public speaking where Eloquence is more necessary. For, on other occasions, the subject on which men speak in public, is frequently sufficient, by itself, to interest the hearers. But the dryness and subtilty of the subjects generally agitated at the Bar, require, more than any other, a certain kind of Eloquence in order to command attention; in order to give proper weight to the arguments that are employed, and to prevent any thing which the Pleader advances from passing unregarded. The effect of good speaking is always very great. There is as much difference in the impression made upon the hearers, by a cold, dry, and confused Speaker, and that made by one who pleads the same cause with elegance, order, and strength, as there is between our conception of an object, when it is presented to us in a dim light, and when we behold it in a full and clear one.

“ weak side of a cause, and learn, at the same time, what is the “ proper defence, from circumstances which, to the party himself,
“ appeared to be of little or no moment.”

It is no small encouragement to Eloquence at the Bar, that of all the liberal professions, none gives fairer play to genius and abilities than that of the Advocate. He is less exposed than some others, to suffer by the arts of rivalry, by popular prejudices, or secret intrigues. He is sure of coming forward according to his merit: for he stands forth every day to view; he enters the list boldly with his competitors; every appearance which he makes is an appeal to the Public; whose decision seldom fails of being just, because it is impartial. Interest and friends may set forward a young Pleader with peculiar advantages beyond others, at the beginning; but they can do no more than open the field to him. A reputation resting on these assistances will soon fall. Spectators remark, Judges decide, Parties watch; and to him will the multitude of Clients never fail to resort, who gives the most approved specimens of his knowledge, eloquence, and industry.

It must be laid down for a first principle, that the Eloquence suited to the Bar, whether in speaking, or in writing law papers, is of the calm and temperate kind, and connected with close reasoning. Sometimes a little play may be allowed to the Imagination, in order to enliven a dry subject, and to give relief to the fatigue of attention; but this liberty must be taken with a sparing hand. For a Florid Style, and a sparkling manner, never fail to make the Speaker be heard with a jealous ear by the Judge. They detract from his weight, and always produce a suspicion of his failing in soundness and strength of argument. It is purity and neatness of expression which is chiefly to be studied; a Style perspicuous and proper, which shall not be needlessly overcharged with the pedantry of law terms, and where, at the same time, no affectation shall appear of avoiding these, when they are suitable and necessary.

Verbosity is a common fault, of which the gentlemen of this profession are accused; and into which the habit of speaking and writing so hastily, and with so little preparation, as they are often obliged to do, almost unavoidably betrays them. It cannot, therefore, be too much recommended to those who are beginning to practise at the Bar, that they should early study to guard against this, while as yet they have full leisure for preparation. Let them form themselves, especially in the papers which they write, to the habit of a strong and a correct Style; which expresses the same thing much better in a few words, than is done by the accumulation of intricate and endless periods. If this habit be once acquired, it will become natural to them afterwards, when the multiplicity of business shall force them to compose in a more precipitant manner. Whereas, if the practice of a loose and negligent Style has been suffered to become familiar, it will not be in their power, even upon occasions when they wish to make an unusual effort, to express themselves with energy and grace.

Distinctness is a capital property in speaking at the Bar. This should be shewn chiefly in two things: first, in stating the question; in shewing clearly what is the point in debate; what we admit; what we deny; and where the line of division begins between us and the adverse party. Next, it should be shewn in the order and arrangement of all the parts of the pleading. In every sort of Oration, a clear method is of the utmost consequence; but in those embroiled and difficult cases which belong to the Bar, it is almost all in all. Too much pains, therefore, cannot be taken in previously studying the plan and method. If there be indistinctness and disorder there, we can have no success in convincing; we leave the whole cause in darkness.

With respect to the conduct of Narration and Argumentation, I shall hereafter make several remarks, when I come to treat of the component parts of a regular Oration. I shall at present only observe, that the Narration of facts at the Bar, should always be as concise as the nature of them will admit. Facts are always of the greatest consequence to be remembered during the course of the pleading; but if the Pleader be tedious in his manner of relating them, and needlessly circumstantial, he lays too great a load upon the memory. Whereas, by cutting off all superfluous circumstances in his recital, he adds strength to the material facts: he both gives a clearer view of what he relates, and makes the impression of it more lasting. In Argumentation, again, I would incline to give scope to a more diffuse manner at the Bar, than on some other occasions. For, in popular Assemblies, where the subject of debate is often a plain question, Arguments, taken from known topics, gain strength by their conciseness. But the obscurity of law points frequently requires the Arguments to be spread out, and placed in different lights in order to be fully apprehended.

When the Pleader comes to refute the arguments employed by his adversary, he should be on his guard not to do them injustice, by disguising or placing them in a false light. The deceit is soon discovered: it will not fail of being exposed; and tends to impress the Judge and the Hearers with distrust of the Speaker, as one who either wants discernment to perceive, or wants fairness to admit, the strength of the reasoning on the other side. Whereas, when they see that he states, with accuracy and candour, the Arguments which have been used against him, before he proceeds to combat them, a strong prejudice is created in his favour. They are naturally led to think, that he has a clear and full conception of all that can be said on both sides of the Argument; that he has entire confidence in the goodness of his own cause; and does not attempt to support it by any artifice or concealment. The Judge is thereby inclined to receive, much more readily, the impressions which are given him by a Speaker, who appears both so fair and so penetrating. There is no part of the discourse, in which the Orator has greater opportunity of shewing a masterly address, than when he sets himself to represent the reasonings of his antagonists, in order to refute them.

Wit may sometimes be of service at the Bar, especially in a lively reply, by which we may throw ridicule on something that has been said on the other side. But though the reputation of wit be dazzling to a young Pleader, I would never advise him to rest his strength upon this talent. It is not his business to make an Audience laugh, but to convince the Judge; and seldom or never did any one rise to eminence in his profession, by being a witty Lawyer.

A proper degree of warmth in pleading a cause is always of use. Though, in speaking to a multitude, greater vehemence be natural; yet, in addressing ourselves even to a single man, the warmth which arises from seriousness and earnestness, is one of the most powerful means of persuading him. An Advocate personates his client; he has taken upon him the whole charge of his interests; he stands in his place. It is improper, therefore, and has a bad effect upon the cause, if he appears indifferent and unmoved; and few clients will be fond of trusting their interests in the hands of a cold Speaker.

At the same time, he must beware of prostituting his earnestness and sensibility so much as to enter with equal warmth into every cause that is committed to him, whether it can be supposed really to excite his zeal or not. There is a dignity of character, which it is of the utmost importance for every one in this profession to support. For it must never be forgotten, that there is no instrument of persuasion more powerful, than an opinion of probity and honour in the person who undertakes to persuade.* It is scarcely possible for any hearer to separate altogether the impression made by the character of him that speaks, from the things that he says. However secretly and imperceptibly, it will be always lending its weight to one side or other; either detracting from, or adding to, the authority and influence of his Speech. This opinion of honour and probity must therefore be carefully preserved, both by some degree of delicacy in the choice of causes, and by the manner of conducting them. And though, perhaps, the nature of the profession may render it extremely difficult to carry this delicacy its utmost length, yet there are attentions to this point, which, as every good man for virtue's sake, so every prudent man for reputation's sake, will find to be necessary. He will always decline embarking in causes that are odious and manifestly unjust; and, when he supports a doubtful cause, he will lay the chief stress upon such arguments as appear to his own judgment the most tenable; reserving his zeal and his indignation for cases where injustice and iniquity are flagrant. But of the personal qualities and virtues requisite in Public Speakers, I shall afterwards have occasion to discourse.

* “Plurimum ad omnia momenti est in hoc positum, si vir bonus creditur. Sic enim contingit, ut non studium advocati, videatur afferre, sed pene testis fidem.”

These are the chief directions which have occurred to me concerning the peculiar strain of Speaking at the Bar. In order to illustrate the subject farther, I shall give a short Analysis of one of Cicero's Pleadings, or judicial Orations. I have chosen that, pro Cluentio. The celebrated one, pro Milone, is more laboured and showy; but it is too declamatory. That, pro Cluentio, comes nearer the strain of a modern Pleading; and though it has the disadvantage of being very long, and complicated too in the subject, yet it is one of the most chaste, correct, and forcible of all Cicero's judicial orations, and well deserves attention for its conduct.

Avitus Cluentius, a Roman knight of splendid family and fortunes, had accused his Step-father Oppianicus of an attempt to poison him. He prevailed in the prosecution; Oppianicus was condemned and banished. But as rumours arose of the Judges having been corrupted by money in this cause, these gave occasion to much popular clamour, and had thrown a heavy odium on Cluentius. Eight years afterwards Oppianicus died. An accusation was brought against Cluentius of having poisoned him, together with a charge also of having bribed the Judges in the former trial to condemn him. In this action Cicero defends him. The accusers were Sasia, the mother of Cluentius, and widow of Oppianicus, and young Oppianicus, the son. Q. Naso, the Prætor, was Judge, together with a considerable number of Judices Selecti.

The introduction of the Oration is simple and proper, taken from no common-place topic, but from the nature of the cause. It begins with taking notice, that the whole Oration of the accuser was divided into two parts.* These two parts were, the charge of having poisoned Oppianicus; on which the accuser, conscious of having no proof, did not lay the stress of his cause; but rested it chiefly on the other charge of formerly corrupting the Judges, which was capital in certain cases by the Roman law. Cicero purposes to follow him in this method, and to apply himself chiefly to the vindication of his Client from the latter charge. He makes several proper observations on the danger of Judges suffering themselves to be swayed by a popular cry, which often is raised by faction, and directed against the innocent. He acknowledges that Cluentius had suffered much and long by reproach, on account of what had passed at the former trial; but begs only a patient and attentive hearing, and assures the Judges, that he will state every thing relating to that matter so fairly and so clearly, as shall give them entire satisfaction. A great appearance of candour reigns throughout this introduction.

* “ Animadvertite, Judices, omnem accusatoris orationem in duas divisam esse partes; quarum altera mihi niti et magnopere confidere videbatur, invidiâ jam inveterata judicii Juniani, altera tantummodo consuetudinis causâ, timidè et diffidentè attingere rationem veneficii criminum; quâ de re lege est hæc questio constituta. Itaque mihi certum est hanc eandem distributionem invidiæ et criminum sic in defensione servare, ut omnes intelligant, nihil me nec subterfugere voluisse reticendo, nec obscure dicendo.”

The crimes with which Cluentius was charged, were heinous. A mother accusing her son, and accusing him of such actions, as having first bribed Judges to condemn her husband, and having afterwards poisoned him, were circumstances that naturally raised strong prejudices against Cicero's client. The first step, therefore, necessary for the Orator, was to remove these prejudices; by shewing what sort of persons Cluentius's mother, and her husband Oppianicus were; and thereby turning the edge of public indignation against them. The nature of the cause rendered this plan altogether proper, and in similar situations it is fit to be imitated. He executes his plan with much eloquence and force; and, in doing it, lays open such a scene of infamy and complicated guilt, as gives a shocking picture of the manners of that age; and such as would seem incredible, did not Cicero refer to the proof that was taken in the former trial, of the facts which he alleges.

Sassia, the mother, appears to have been altogether of an abandoned character. Soon after the death of her first husband, the father of Cluentius, she fell in love with Aurius Melinus, a young man of illustrious birth and great fortune, who was married to her own daughter. She prevailed with him to divorce her daughter, and then she married him herself. * This Melinus being afterwards, by the means of Oppianicus, involved in Sylla's proscription, and put to death; and Sassia being left for the second time a widow, and in a very opulent situation, Oppianicus himself made his addresses to her. She, not startled at the impudence of the proposal, nor at the thoughts of marrying one, whose hands had been imbrued in her former husband's blood, objected only, as Cicero says, to Oppianicus having two sons by his present wife. Oppianicus removed the objection, by having his sons privately dispatched; and then divorcing his wife, the infamous match was concluded between him and Sassia. These flagrant deeds are painted, as we may well believe, with the highest colours of Cicero's Eloquence, which here has a very proper field. Cluentius, as a man of honour, could no longer live on any tolerable terms with a woman, a mother only in the name, who had loaded herself and all her family with so much dishonour; and hence the feud which had ever since subsisted between them, and had involved her unfortunate son in so much trouble and persecution. As for Oppianicus, Cicero gives a sort of history of his life, and a full detail of his crimes; and by what he relates, Oppianicus appears to have been a man daring, fierce, and cruel, insatiable in avarice and ambition; trained and hardened in all the crimes which those turbulent times of Marius and Sylla's proscriptions produced: "Such a man," says our Orator, "as, in place of being surprised that he was condemned, you ought rather to wonder that he had escaped so long."

* " Lectum illum genialem quem biennio ante filiae suae nubenti straverat, in eadem domo sibi ornari et sterni, expulsâ atque exturbatâ filia, jubet. Nubit genêro socrus, nullis auspiciibus funestis omnibus omnium. O mulieris scelus incredibile, & præter hanc unam, in omni vita inauditum! O audaciam singularem! non timuisse, si minus vim Deorum, hominumque famam, at illam ipsam noctem, facesque illas nuptiales? non limen cubi- culi? non cubile filiae? non parietes denique ipsos superiorum testes nuptiarum? perfregit ac prostravit omnia cupiditate & furore? vicit pudorem libido; timorem audacia; rationem amentia." The warmth of Cicero's Eloquence, which this passage beautifully exemplifies, is here fully justified by the subject.

And now, having prepared the way by all this narration, which is clear and elegant, he enters on the history of that famous trial in which his client was charged with corrupting the Judges. Both Cluentius and Oppianicus were of the city Larinum. In a public contest about the rights of the freemen of that city, they had taken opposite sides, which embittered the misunderstanding already subsisting between them. Sasia, now the wife of Oppianicus, pushed him on to the destruction of her son, whom she had long hated, as one who was conscious of her crimes; and as Cluentius was known to have made no will, they expected, upon his death, to succeed to his fortune. The plan was formed, therefore, to dispatch him by poison; which, considering their former conduct, is no incredible part of the story. Cluentius was at that time indisposed: the servant of his physician was to be bribed to give him poison, and one Fabricius, an intimate friend of Oppianicus, was employed in the negotiation. The servant having made the discovery, Cluentius first prosecuted Scamander, a freedman of Fabricius, in whose custody the poison was found; and afterwards Fabricius, for this attempt upon his life. He prevailed in both actions : and both these persons were condemned by the voices, almost unanimous, of the Judges.

Of both these Prejudicia, as our Author calls them, or previous trials, he gives a very particular account ; and rests upon them a great part of his argument, as, in neither of them, there was the least charge or suspicion of any attempt to corrupt the Judges. But in both these trials, Oppianicus was pointed at plainly ; in both Scamander and Fabricius were prosecuted as only the instruments and ministers of his cruel designs. As a natural consequence, therefore, Cluentius immediately afterwards raised a third prosecution, against Oppianicus himself, the contriver and author of the whole. It was in this prosecution, that money was said to have been given to the Judges ; all Rome was filled with the report of it, and the alarm loudly raised, that no man's life or liberty was safe, if such dangerous practices were not checked. By the following arguments, Cicero defends his client against this heavy charge of the Crimen corrupti Judicii.

He reasons first, that there was not the least reason to suspect it ; seeing the condemnation of Oppianicus was a direct and necessary consequence of the judgments given against Scamander and Fabricius, in the two former trials ; trials, that were fair and uncorrupted, to the satisfaction of the whole world. Yet by these, the road was laid clearly open to the detection of Oppianicus's guilt. His instruments and ministers being once condemned, and by the very same Judges too, nothing could be more absurd than to raise a cry about an innocent person being circumvented by bribery, when it was evident, on the contrary, that a guilty person was now brought into judgment, under such circumstances, that unless the Judges were altogether inconsistent with themselves, it was impossible for him to be acquitted.

He reasons next, that, if in this trial there were any corruption of the Judges by money, it was infinitely more probable, that corruption should have proceeded from Oppianicus than from Cluentius. For setting aside the difference of character between the two men, the one fair, the other flagitious; what motive had Cluentius to try so odious and dangerous an experiment, as that of bribing Judges? Was it not much more likely that he should have had recourse to this last remedy, who saw and knew himself and his cause to be in the utmost danger; than the other, who had a cause clear in itself, and of the issue of which, in consequence of the two previous sentences given by the same Judges, he had full reason to be confident? Was it not much more likely, that he should bribe, who had every thing to fear; whose life and liberty, and fortune were at stake; than he who had already prevailed in a material part of his charge, and who had no further interest in the issue of the prosecution, than as justice was concerned?

In the third place, he asserts it as a certain fact, that Oppianicus did attempt to bribe the Judges: that the corruption in this trial, so much complained of, was employed, not by Cluentius, but against him. He calls on Titus Attius, the Orator on the opposite side; he challenges him to deny, if he can, or if he dare, that Stalenus, one of the thirty-two Judices Selecti, did receive money from Oppianicus; he names the sum that was given; he names the persons that were present, when, after the trial was over, Stalenus was obliged to refund the bribe. This is a strong fact, and would seem quite decisive. But, unluckily, a very cross circumstance occurs here. For this very Stalenus gave his voice to condemn Oppianicus. For this strange incident Cicero accounts in the following manner: Stalenus, says he, known to be a worthless man, and accustomed before to the like practices, entered into a treaty with Oppianicus to bring him off, and demanded for that purpose a certain sum, which he undertook to distribute among a competent number of the other Judges. When he was once in possession of the money; when he found a greater treasure, than ever he had been master of, deposited in his empty and wretched habitation, he became very unwilling to part with any of it to his colleagues; and bethought himself of some means by which he could contrive to keep it all to himself. The scheme which he devised for this purpose, was, to promote the condemnation, instead of the acquittal of Oppianicus; as, from a condemned person, he did not apprehend much danger of being called to account, or being obliged to make restitution. Instead, therefore, of endeavouring to gain any of his colleagues, he irritated such as he had influence with against Oppianicus, by first promising them money in his name, and afterwards telling them, that Oppianicus had cheated him.* When sentence was to be pronounced, he had taken measures for being absent himself; but being brought by Oppianicus's Lawyers from another court, and obliged to give his voice, he found it necessary to lead the way, in condemning the man whose money he had taken, without fulfilling the bargain which he had made with him.

* "Cum esset agens, sumptuosus, audax, callidus, perfidiosus, & cum domi suæ, miserrimis in locis, et inanissimis, tantum numerorum positum viderit, ad omnem malitiam & fraudem versare mentem suam cœpit. Demne Judicibus? mihi igitur, ipsi præter periculum et infamiam quæretur? Siquis eum forte casus ex periculo eripuerit, nonne reddendum est? præcipitantem igitur

By these plausible facts and reasonings, the character of Cluentius seems in a great measure cleared; and, what Cicero chiefly intended, the odium thrown upon the adverse party. But a difficult part of the Orator's business still remained. There were several subsequent decisions of the Prætor, the Censors, and the Senate, against the Judges in this cause; which all proceeded, or seemed to proceed, upon this ground of bribery and corruption; for it is plain the suspicion prevailed, that if Oppianicus had given money to Stalenus, Cluentius had outbribed him. To all these decisions, however, Cicero replies with much distinctness and subtilty of argument; though it might be tedious to follow him through all his reasonings on these heads. He shows, that the facts were, at that time, very indistinctly known; that the decisions appealed to were hastily given; that not one of them concluded directly against his Client; and that, such as they were, they were entirely brought about by the inflammatory and factious harangues of Quinctius, the Tribune of the People, who had been the Agent and Advocate of Oppianicus; and who, enraged at the defeat he had sustained, had employed all his tribunitial influence to raise a storm against the Judges who condemned his Client.

“ impellamus, inquit, et perditum prosternamus. Capit hoc consilium et pecuniam quibusdam iudicibus levissimis polliceatur, deinde eam postea supprimat; ut quoniam graves homines suâ sponte severe iudicaturos putabat, hos qui leviores erant, destitutione iratos Oppianicô redderet.”

At length, Cicero comes to reason concerning the point of Law. The Crimen Corrupti Judicii, or the bribing of Judges, was capital. In the famous Lex Cornelia de Sicariis, was contained this clause (which we find still extant, Pandect. lib. xlviii. Tit. 10. § 1.): “ Qui judicem corruperit, vel corrumpendum curaverit, hæc lege teneatur.” This clause, however, we learn from Cicero, was restricted to Magistrates and Senators; and as Cluentius was only of the Equestrian Order, he was not, even supposing him guilty, within the law. Of this Cicero avails himself doubly; and as he shows here the most masterly address, I shall give a summary of his pleading on this part of the cause: “ You,” says he to the Advocate for the prosecutor, “ you, T. Attius, I know, had every where given it out, that I was to defend my Client, not from facts, not upon the footing of innocence, but by taking advantage merely of the law in his behalf. Have I done so? I appeal to yourself. Have I sought to cover him behind a legal defence only? On the contrary, have I not pleaded his cause as if he had been a Senator, liable, by the Cornelian law, to be capitally convicted; and shown, that neither proof nor probable presumption lies against his innocence? In doing so, I must acquaint you, that I have complied with the desire of Cluentius himself. For when he first consulted me in this cause, and when I informed him that it was clear no action could be brought against him from the Cornelian Law, he instantly besought and obtested me, that I “ would not rest his defence upon that ground ;

“ saying, with tears in his eyes, That his reputation “ was as dear to him as his life ; and that what he “ sought as an innocent man, was not only to be “ absolved from any penalty, but to be acquitted in “ the opinion of all his fellow-citizens.

“ Hitherto, then, I have pleaded this cause upon “ his plan. But my Client must forgive me, if now
“ I shall plead it upon my own. For I should be “ wanting to myself, and to that regard which my “ character and station require me to bear to the “ laws of the State, if I should allow any person to “ be judged of by a law which does not bind him.
“ You, Attius, indeed, have told us, that it was a “ scandal and reproach, that a Roman Knight should “ be exempted from those penalties to which a Sena“ tor, for corrupting Judges, is liable. But I must “ tell you, that it would be a much greater reproach, “ in a State that is regulated by law, to depart from “ the law. What safety have any of us in our per“ sons, what security for our rights, if the law shall “ be set aside ? By what title do you, Q. Naso, sit in “ that chair, and preside in this judgment ? By what “ right, T. Attius, do you accuse, or do I defend ?
“ Whence all the solemnity and pomp of Judges,
“ and Clerks, and Officers, of which this house is “ full ? Does not all proceed from the law, which “ regulates the whole departments of the State ;
“ which, as a common bond, holds its members “ together ; and, like the soul within the body, actu“ ates and directs all the public functions ?* On

* “ Ait Attius, indignum esse facinus, si senator iudicio quem“ quam circumvenerit, eum legibus teneri ; si Eques Romanus

“ what ground, then, dare you speak lightly of the “ law, or move that, in a criminal trial, Judges “ should advance one step beyond what it permits “ them to go? The wisdom of our ancestors has “ found, that, as Senators and Magistrates enjoy “ higher dignities, and greater advantages than other “ members of the State, the Law should also, with “ regard to them, be more strict, and the purity and “ uncorruptedness of their morals be guarded by “ more severe sanctions. But if it be your pleasure “ that this institution should be altered, if you wish “ to have the Cornelian Law, concerning bribery, “ extended to all ranks, then let us join, not in vio“ lating the law, but in proposing to have this altera“ tion made by a new law. My Client, Cluentius, “ will be the foremost in this measure, who now,
 “ while the old law subsists, rejected its defence,
 “ and required his cause to be pleaded, as if he had “ been bound by it. But, though he would not avail “ himself of the law, you are bound in justice not “ to stretch it beyond its proper limits.”

Such is the reasoning of Cicero on this head; eloquent, surely, and strong. As his manner is diffuse, I “ hoc idem fecerit, eum non teneri. Ut tibi concedam hoc indig-“ num esse, tu mihi concedas necesse est multo esse indignius, in “ eâ civitate quæ legibus contineatur, discedi a legibus. Hoc “ nam vinculum est hujus dignitatis qua fruimur in republicâ.

 “ Hoc fundamentum libertatis; hic fons equitatis; mens et ani“ mus, et consilium, et sententia civitatis posita est in legibus.
 “ Ut corpora nostra sine mente, sic civitas sine lege, suis partibus, “ ut nervis ac sanguine & membris, uti non potest. Legum minis-
 “ tri, magistratus; legum interpretes, judices; legum denique “ idcirco omnes simus servi, ut liber esse possimus. Quid est, “ Q. Naso, cur tu in hoc loco sedeas?” &c.

have greatly abridged it from the original, but have endeavoured to retain its force.

In the latter part of the Oration, Cicero treats of the other accusation that was brought against Cluentius, of having poisoned Oppianicus. On this, it appears, his accusers themselves laid small stress; having placed their chief hope in overwhelming Cluentius with the odium of bribery in the former trial; and therefore, on this part of the cause, Cicero does not dwell long. He shows the improbability of the whole tale which they related concerning this pretended poisoning, and makes it appear to be altogether destitute of any shadow of proof.

Nothing, therefore, remains but the Peroration, or Conclusion of the whole. In this, as indeed throughout the whole of this Oration, Cicero is uncommonly chaste, and, in the midst of much warmth and earnestness, keeps clear of turgid declamation. The Peroration turns on two points; the indignation which the character and conduct of Sasia ought to excite, and the compassion due to a son, persecuted through his whole life by such a mother. He recapitulates the crimes of Sasia; her lewdness, her violation of every decorum, her incestuous marriages, her violence and cruelty. He places, in the most odious light, the eagerness and fury which she had shown in the suit she was carrying on against her son; describes her journey from Larinum to Rome, with a train of attendants, and a great store of money, that she might employ every method for circumventing and oppressing him in this trial; while, in the whole course of her journey she was so detested, as to make a solitude wherever she lodged; she was shunned and avoided by all; her company, and her very looks, were reckoned contagious; the house was deemed polluted which was entered into by so abandoned a woman.* To this he opposes the character of Cluentius, fair, unspotted, and respectable. He produces the testimonies of the magistrates of Larinum in his favour, given in the most ample and honourable manner by a public decree, and supported by a great concourse of the most noted inhabitants, who were now present, to second every thing that Cicero could say in favour of Cluentius.

“ Wherefore, Judges,” he concludes, “ if you “ abominate crimes, stop the triumph of this impious “ woman, prevent this most unnatural mother from “ rejoicing in her son’s blood. If you love virtue “ and worth, relieve this unfortunate man, who, for “ so many years, has been exposed to most unjust “ reproach through the calumnies raised against him
 “ by Sassia, Oppianicus, and all their adherents.
 “ Better far had it been for him to have ended his

* “ Cùm appropinquare hujus judicium ei nuntiatum est, con“ festim hic advolavit; ne aut accusatoribus diligentia, aut pecunia “ testibus deesset; aut ne forte mater hoc sibi optatissimum spec-“ taculum hujus sordium atque luctus, et tanti squaloris amitteret.
 “ Jam vero quod iter Romam hujus mulieris fuisse existimatis?
 “ Quod ego propter vicinitatem Aquinatium et Venafranorum ex “ multis comperi: quos concursus in his oppidis? Quantos et “ virorum et mulierum gemitus esse factos? Mulierem quandam “ Larino, atque illam usque a mari supero Romam proficisci cum “ magno comitatu et pecunia, quo facilius circumvenire judicio “ capitis, atque opprimere filium possit. Nemo erat illorum, pœne “ dicam, quin expiandum illum locum esse arbitraretur quacunque “ illa iter fecisset; nemo quin terram ipsam violari, quæ mater est “ omnium, vestigiis consceleratae matris putaret. Itaque nullo in “ oppido consistendi ei potestas fuit: nemo ex tot hospitibus “ inventus est qui non contagionem aspectus fugeret.”

“ days at once by the poison which Oppianicus had “ prepared for him, than to have escaped those “ snares, if he must still be oppressed by an odium
 “ which I have shown to be so unjust. But in you
 “ he trusts, in your clemency and your equity, that “ now, on a full and fair hearing of his cause, you “ will restore him to his honour; you will restore “ him to his friends and fellow-citizens, of whose “ zeal and high estimation of him you have seen “ such strong proofs; and will show, by your deci“ sion, that though faction and calumny may reign “ for a while in popular meetings and harangues, in “ trial and judgment regard is paid to the truth
 “ only.”

I have given only a skeleton of this Oration of Cicero. What I have principally aimed at, was to show his disposition and method; his arrangement of facts, and the conduct and force of some of his main arguments. But, in order to have a full view of the subject, and of the art with which the Orator manages it, recourse must be had to the original. Few of Cicero's Orations contain a greater variety of facts and argumentations, which renders it difficult to analyse it fully. But for this reason I chose it, as an excellent example of managing at the Bar a complex and intricate cause, with order, elegance, and force.

LECTURE XXIX.

ELOQUENCE OF THE PULPIT.

BEFORE treating of the structure and component parts of a regular Oration, I purposed making some observations on the peculiar strain, the distinguishing characters, of each of the three great kinds of Public Speaking. I have already treated of the Eloquence of Popular Assemblies, and of the Eloquence of the Bar. The subject which remains for this Lecture is, the strain and spirit of that Eloquence which is suited to the Pulpit.

Let us begin with considering the advantages and disadvantages, which belong to this field of Public Speaking. The Pulpit has plainly several advantages peculiar to itself. The dignity and importance of its subjects must be acknowledged superior to any other. They are such as ought to interest every one, and can be brought home to every man's heart; and such as admit, at the same time, both the highest embellishment in describing, and the greatest vehemence and warmth in enforcing them. The Preacher has also great advantages in treating his subjects. He speaks not to one or a few Judges, but to a large Assembly. He is secure from all interruption. He is obliged to no replies, or extemporaneous efforts. He chuses his theme at leisure; and comes to the public with all the assistance which the most accurate premeditation can give him.

But, together with these advantages, there are also peculiar difficulties that attend the Eloquence of the Pulpit. The Preacher, it is true, has no trouble in contending with an adversary; but then, Debate and Contention enliven genius, and procure attention. The Pulpit Orator is, perhaps, in too quiet possession of his field. His subjects of discourse are, in themselves, noble and important, but they are subjects trite and familiar. They have for ages employed so many speakers and so many pens; the public ear is so much accustomed to them, that it requires more than an ordinary power of genius to fix attention. Nothing within the reach of art is more difficult, than to bestow on what is common, the grace of novelty. No sort of composition whatever is such a trial of skill, as where the merit of it lies wholly in the execution; not in giving any information that is new, not in convincing men of what they did not believe; but in dressing truths which they knew, and of which they were before convinced, in such colours as may most forcibly affect their imagination and heart.* It is to be considered too, that the

* What I have said on this subject, coincides very much with the observations made by the famous M. Bruyere, in his Mœurs de Siecle, when he is comparing the Eloquence of the Pulpit to that of the Bar. “ L'Eloquence de la chaire, en ce qui y entre “ d'humain, & du talent de l'orateur, est cachée, connue de peu “ de personnes, & d'une difficile execution. Il faut marcher par “ des chemins battus, dire ce qui a été dit, & ce qui l'on prévoit “ que vous allez dire: les matières sont grandes, mais usées & “ triviales; les principes surs, mais dont les auditeurs penetrent “ les conclusions d'une seule vûe: il y entre de sujets qui sont subject of the Preacher generally confines him to abstract qualities, to virtues and vices; whereas, that of other popular Speakers leads them to treat of persons; which is a subject that commonly interests the hearers more, and takes faster hold of the imagination. The Preacher's business is solely to make you detest the crime. The Pleader's to make you detest the criminal. He describes a living person; and with more facility rouses your indignation. From these causes, it comes to pass, that though we have a great number of moderately good Preachers, we have, however, so few that are singularly eminent. We are still far from perfection in the Art of Preaching; and perhaps there are few things in which it is more difficult to excel.* The object, however,

“ sublimes, mais qui peut traiter le sublime? — Le Prédicateur “ n'est point soutenu comme l'avocat par des faits toujours nou-“ veaux, par de différens événemens, par des aventures inouies;
 “ il ne s'exerce point sur les questions douteuses; il ne fait “ point valoir les violentes conjectures, & les présomptions; “ toutes choses, néanmoins, qui élèvent le génie, lui donnent de la “ force, & de l'étendue, & qui contraignent bien moins l'éloquence, “ qu'elles ne le fixent, & le dirigent. Il doit, au contraire, tirer “ son discours d'une source commune, & au tout le monde puise; “ & s'il s'écarte de ces lieux communs, il n'est plus populaire; il “ est abstrait ou déclamateur.” — The inference which he draws from these reflections is very just — “ Il est plus aisé de prêcher “ que de plaider; mais plus difficile de bien prêcher que de bien “ plaider.” Les Caracteres, ou Mœurs de ce Siecle. p. 601.

* What I say here, and in other passages, of our being far from perfection in the Art of Preaching, and of there being few who are singularly eminent in it, is to be always understood as referring to an ideal view of the perfection of this art, which none, perhaps, since the days of the Apostles, ever did, or ever will, reach. But in that degree of the Eloquence of the Pulpit, which promotes, in a considerable measure, the great end of edification, and gives a is noble, and worthy, upon many accounts, of being pursued with zeal.

It may perhaps occur to some, that Preaching is no proper subject of the Art of Eloquence. This, it may be said, belongs only to human studies and inventions: but the truths of religion, with the greater simplicity, and the less mixture of art they are set forth, are likely to prove the more successful. This objection would have weight, if Eloquence were, as the persons who make such an objection commonly take it to be, an ostentatious and deceitful art, the study of words and of plausibility only, calculated to please, and to tickle the ear. But against this idea of Eloquence I have all along guarded. True Eloquence is the art of placing truth in the most advantageous light for conviction and persuasion. This is what every good man who preaches the Gospel not only may, but ought to have at heart. It is most intimately connected with the success of his ministry; and were it needful, as assuredly it is not, to reason any further on this head, we might refer to the Discourses of the Prophets and Apostles, as models of the most sublime and persuasive Eloquence, adapted both to the imagination and the passions of men.

just title to high reputation and esteem, there are many who hold a very honourable rank. I agree entirely in opinion with a candid judge (Dr. Campbell on Rhetoric, B. i. ch. 10.), who observes, that, considering how rare the talent of Eloquence is among men, and considering all the disadvantages under which Preachers labour, particularly from the frequency of this exercise, joined with the other duties of their office, to which fixed Pastors are obliged, there is more reason to wonder that we hear so many instructive, and even eloquent Sermons, than that we hear so few.

An essential requisite, in order to preach well, is to have a just, and, at the same time, a fixed and habitual view of the end of Preaching. For in no art can any man execute well, who has not a just idea of the end and object of that art. The end of all preaching is, to persuade men to become good. Every Sermon, therefore, should be a persuasive Oration. Not but that the Preacher is to instruct and to teach, to reason and to argue. All persuasion, as I showed formerly, is to be founded on conviction. The understanding must always be applied to in the first place, in order to make a lasting impression on the heart; and he who would work on men's passions, or influence their practice, without first giving them just principles, and enlightening their minds, is no better than a mere declaimer. He may raise transient emotions, or kindle a passing ardour; but can produce no solid or lasting effect. At the same time, it must be remembered, that all the Preacher's instructions are to be of the practical kind; and that persuasion must ever be his ultimate object. It is not to discuss some abstruse point, that he ascends the Pulpit. It is not to illustrate some metaphysical truth, or to inform men of something which they never heard before; but it is to make them better men; it is to give them at once, clear views, and persuasive impressions of religious truth. The Eloquence of the Pulpit, then, must be Popular Eloquence. One of the first qualities of preaching is to be popular; not in the sense of accommodation to the humours and prejudices of the people (which tends only to make a preacher contemptible), but in the true sense of the word, calculated to make impression on the people; to strike and to seize their hearts. I scruple not therefore to assert, that the abstract and philosophical manner of preaching, however it may have sometimes been admired, is formed upon a very faulty idea, and deviates widely from the just plan of Pulpit Eloquence. Rational, indeed, a Preacher ought always to be; he must give his audience clear ideas on every subject, and entertain them with sense, not with sound; but to be an accurate Reasoner will be small praise, if he be not a persuasive Speaker also.

Now, if this be the proper idea of a Sermon, a persuasive oration, one very material consequence follows, that the Preacher himself, in order to be successful, must be a good man. In a preceding Lecture, I endeavoured to show, that on no subject can any man be truly eloquent, who does not utter the "veræ voces ab imo pectore," who does not speak the language of his own conviction, and his own feelings. If this holds, as in my opinion, it does in other kinds of Public Speaking, it certainly holds in the highest degree in Preaching. There, it is of the utmost consequence that the Speaker firmly believe both the truth and the importance of those principles which he inculcates on others; and not only that he believe them speculatively, but have a lively and serious feeling of them. This will always give an earnestness and strength, a fervour of piety to his exhortations, superior in its effects to all the arts of studied Eloquence; and, without it, the assistance of art will seldom be able to conceal the mere declaimer. A spirit of true piety would prove the most effectual guard against those errors which Preachers are apt to commit. It would make their discourses solid, cogent, and useful; it would prevent those frivolous and ostentatious harangues, which have no other aim than merely to make a parade of Speech, or amuse an audience; and perhaps the difficulty of attaining that pitch of habitual piety and goodness, which the perfection of Pulpit Eloquence would require, and of uniting it with that thorough knowledge of the world, and those other talents which are requisite for excelling in the Pulpit, is one of the great causes why so few arrive at very high eminence in this sphere.

The chief characteristics of the Eloquence suited to the Pulpit, as distinguished from the other kinds of Public Speaking, appear to me to be these two, Gravity and Warmth. The serious nature of the subjects belonging to the Pulpit, requires Gravity; their importance to mankind, requires Warmth. It is far from being either easy or common to unite these characters of Eloquence. The Grave, when it is predominant, is apt to run into a dull uniform solemnity. The Warm when it wants gravity, borders on the theatrical and light. The union of the two must be studied by all Preachers as of the utmost consequence, both in the composition of their discourses, and in their manner of delivery. Gravity and Warmth united, form that character of preaching which the French call Onction; the affecting, penetrating, interesting manner, flowing from a strong sensibility of heart in the Preacher to the importance of those truths which he delivers, and an earnest desire that they may make full impression on the hearts of his Hearers.

Next to a just idea of the nature and object of Pulpit Eloquence, the point of greatest importance to a Preacher, is a proper choice of the subjects on which he preaches. To give rules for the choice of subjects for Sermons, belongs to the theological more than the rhetorical chair; only in general, they should be such as appear to the Preacher to be the most useful, and the best accommodated to the circumstances of his Audience. No man can be called eloquent, who speaks to an Assembly on subjects, or in a strain, which none or few of them comprehend. The unmeaning applause which the ignorant give to what is above their capacity, common sense and common probity must teach every man to despise. Usefulness and true Eloquence always go together; and no man can long be reputed a good Preacher who is not acknowledged to be an useful one.

The rules which relate to the conduct of the different parts of a Sermon, the Introduction, Division, argumentative and pathetic parts, I reserve till I come to treat of the conduct of a Discourse in general; but some rules and observations, which respect a Sermon as a particular species of composition, I shall now give, and I hope they may be of some use.

The first which I shall mention is, to attend to the Unity of a Sermon. Unity indeed is of great consequence in every composition; but in other Discourses, where the choice and direction of the subject are not left to the Speaker, it may be less in his power to preserve it. In a Sermon, it must be always the Preacher's own fault if he transgress it. What I mean by Unity is, that there should be some one main point to which the whole strain of the Sermon should refer. It must not be a bundle of different subjects strung together, but one object must predominate throughout. This rule is founded on what we all experience, that the mind can fully attend only to one capital object at a time. By dividing, you always weaken the impression. Now this Unity, without which no Sermon can either have much beauty, or much force, does not require that there should be no divisions or separate heads in the Discourse, or that one single thought only should be, again and again, turned up to the hearers in different lights. It is not to be understood in so narrow a sense: it admits of some variety; it admits of under parts and appendages, provided always that so much Union and Connection be preserved, as to make the whole concur in some one impression upon the mind. I may employ, for instance, several different arguments to enforce the love of God; I may also inquire, perhaps, into the causes of the decay of this virtue; still one great object is presented to the mind; but if, because my text says, "He that loveth God, must love his brother also," I should, therefore, mingle in one Discourse arguments for the love of God and for the love of our neighbour, I should offend unpardonably against Unity, and leave a very loose and confused impression on the Hearers' minds.

In the second place, Sermons are always the more striking, and commonly the more useful, the more precise and particular the subject of them is. This follows, in a great measure, from what I was just now illustrating. Though a general subject is capable of being conducted with a considerable degree of Unity, yet that Unity can never be so complete as in a particular one. The impression made must always be more undeterminate; and the instruction conveyed, will, commonly, too, be less direct and convincing.

General subjects, indeed, such as the excellency of the pleasures of religion, are often chosen by young Preachers, as the most showy, and the easiest to be handled; and, doubtless, general views of religion are not to be neglected, as on several occasions they have great propriety. But these are not the subjects most favourable for producing the high effects of preaching. They fall in almost unavoidably with the beaten track of common-place thought. Attention is much more commanded by seizing some particular view of a great subject, some single interesting topic, and directing to that point the whole force of Argument and Eloquence. To recommend some one grace or virtue, or to inveigh against a particular vice, furnishes a subject not deficient in unity or precision; but if we confine ourselves to that virtue or vice as assuming a particular aspect, and consider it as it appears in certain characters, or affects certain situations in life, the subject becomes still more interesting. The execution is, I admit, more difficult, but the merit and the effect are higher.

In the third place, never study to say all that can be said upon a subject; no error is greater than this. Select the most useful, the most striking and persuasive topics which the text suggests, and rest the Discourse upon these. If the doctrines which Ministers of the Gospel preach were altogether new to their hearers, it might be requisite for them to be exceedingly full on every particular, lest there should be any hazard of their not affording complete information. But it is much less for the sake of information than of persuasion, that Discourses are delivered from the Pulpit; and nothing is more opposite to persuasion, than an unnecessary and tedious fulness.

There are always some things which the Preacher may suppose to be known, and some things which he may only slightly touch. If he seek to omit nothing which his subject suggests, it will unavoidably happen that he will encumber it, and weaken its force.

In studying a Sermon, he ought to place himself in the situation of a serious Hearer. Let him suppose the subject addressed to himself: let him consider what views of it would strike him most; what arguments would be most likely to persuade him; what parts of it would dwell most upon his mind. Let these be employed as his principal materials; and in these it is most likely his genius will exert itself with the greatest vigour. The spinning and wire-drawing mode, which is not uncommon among Preachers, enervates the noblest truths. It may indeed be a consequence of observing the rule which I am now giving, that fewer Sermons will be preached upon one text than is sometimes done; but this will, in my opinion, be attended with no disadvantage. I know no benefit that arises from introducing a whole system of religious truth under every text. The simplest and most natural method by far, is to chuse that view of a subject to which the text principally leads, and to dwell no longer on the text, than is sufficient for discussing the subject in that view, which can commonly be done with sufficient profoundness and distinctness, in one or a few discourses: for it is a very false notion to imagine, that they always preach the most profoundly, or go the deepest into a subject, who dwell on it the longest. On the contrary, that tedious circuit, which some are ready to take in all their illustrations, is very frequently owing, either to their want of discernment for perceiving what is most important in the subject; or to their want of ability for placing it in the most proper point of view.

In the fourth place, Study above all things to render your instructions interesting to the Hearers. This is the great trial and mark of true genius for the Eloquence of the Pulpit: for nothing is so fatal to success in preaching, as a dry manner. A dry Sermon can never be a good one. In order to preach in an interesting manner, much will depend upon the delivery of a Discourse; for the manner in which a man speaks, is of the utmost consequence for affecting his Audience; but much will also depend on the composition of the Discourse. Correct language, and elegant description, are but the secondary instruments of preaching in an interesting manner. The great secret lies, in bringing home all that is spoken to the hearts of the Hearers, so as to make every man think that the Preacher is addressing him in particular. For this end, let him avoid all intricate reasonings; avoid expressing himself in general speculative propositions, or laying down practical truths in an abstract metaphysical manner. As much as possible, the Discourse ought to be carried on in the strain of direct address to the Audience; not in the strain of one writing an essay, but of one speaking to a multitude, and studying to mix what is called Application, or what has an immediate reference to practice, with the doctrinal and didactic parts of the Sermon.

It will be of much advantage to keep always in view the different ages, characters, and conditions of men, and to accommodate directions and exhortations to these different classes of Hearers. Whenever you bring forth what a man feels to touch his own character, or to suit his own circumstances, you are sure of interesting him. No study is more necessary for this purpose, than the study of human life, and the human heart. To be able to unfold the heart, and to discover a man to himself, in a light in which he never saw his own character before, produces a wonderful effect. As long as the Preacher hovers in a cloud of general observations, and descends not to trace the particular lines and features of manners; the Audience are apt to think themselves unconcerned in the description. It is the striking accuracy of moral characters, that gives the chief power and effect to a Preacher's Discourse. Hence, examples founded on historical facts, and drawn from real life, of which kind the Scriptures afford many, always, when they are well chosen, command high attention. No favourable opportunity of introducing these should be omitted. They correct, in some degree, that disadvantage to which I before observed preaching is subject, of being confined to treat of qualities in the abstract, not of persons, and place the weight and reality of religious truths in the most convincing light. Perhaps the most beautiful, and among the most useful Sermons of any, though, indeed, the most difficult in composition, are such as are wholly characteristical, or founded on the illustration of some peculiar character, or remarkable piece of history, in the sacred writings; by pursuing which one can trace, and lay open, some of the most secret windings of man's heart. Other topics of preaching have been much beaten; but this is a field, which, wide in itself, has hitherto been little explored by the composers of Sermons, and possesses all the advantages of being curious, new, and highly useful. Bishop Butler's Sermon on the character of Balaam, will give an idea of that sort of preaching which I have in my eye.

In the fifth and last place, Let me add a caution against taking the model of preaching from particular fashions that chance to have the vogue. These are torrents that swell to-day, and will have spent themselves by to-morrow. Sometimes it is the taste of poetical preaching, sometimes of philosophical, that has the fashion on its side; at one time it must be all pathetic, at another time all argumentative, according as some celebrated preacher has set the example. Each of these modes, in the extreme, is very faulty; and he who conforms himself to any of them, will both cramp genius and corrupt it. It is the universal taste of mankind, which is subject to no such changing modes, that alone is entitled to possess any authority; and this will never give its sanction to any strain of preaching, but what is founded on human nature, connected with usefulness, adapted to the proper idea of a Sermon, as a serious persuasive Oration, delivered to a multitude, in order to make them better men. Let a preacher form himself upon this standard, and keep it close in his eye, and he will be in a much surer road to reputation, and success at last, than by a servile compliance with any popular taste, or transient humour of his Hearers. Truth and good sense are firm, and will establish themselves; mode and humour are feeble and fluctuating. Let him never follow, implicitly, any one example; or become a servile imitator of any Preacher, however much admired. From various examples, he may pick up much for his improvement; some he may prefer to the rest; but the servility of imitation extinguishes all genius, or rather is a proof of the entire want of genius.

With respect to Style, that which the Pulpit requires, must certainly, in the first place, be very perspicuous. As discourses spoken there are calculated for the instruction of all sorts of hearers, plainness and simplicity should reign in them. All unusual, swoln, or high-sounding words, should be avoided; especially all words that are merely poetical, or merely philosophical. Young Preachers are apt to be caught with the glare of these; and in young Composers the error may be excusable; but they may be assured that it is an error, and proceeds from their not having yet acquired a correct Taste. Dignity of expression, indeed, the Pulpit requires in a high degree; nothing that is mean or groveling, no low or vulgar phrases, ought on any account to be admitted. But this dignity is perfectly consistent with simplicity. The words employed may be all plain words, easily understood, and in common use; and yet the Style may be abundantly dignified, and, at the same time, very lively and animated. For a lively and animated Style is extremely suited to the Pulpit. The earnestness which a Preacher ought to feel, and the grandeur and importance of his subjects, justify and often require warm and glowing expressions. He not only may employ metaphors and comparisons, but, on proper occasions, may apostrophise the saint or the sinner; may personify inanimate objects, break out into bold exclamations, and, in general, has the command of the most passionate figures of Speech. But on this subject, of the proper use and management of figures, I have insisted so fully in former Lectures, that I have no occasion now to give particular directions; unless it be only to recal to mind that most capital rule, never to employ strong figures, or a pathetic Style, except in cases where the subject leads to them, and where the Speaker is impelled to the use of them by native unaffected warmth.

The language of Sacred Scripture, properly employed, is a great ornament to Sermons. It may be employed, either in the way of quotation or allusion. Direct quotations, brought from Scripture, in order to support what the Preacher inculcates, both give authority to his doctrine, and render his discourse more solemn and venerable. Allusions to remarkable passages, or expressions of Scripture, when introduced with propriety, have generally a pleasing effect. They afford the Preacher a fund of metaphorical expression which no other composition enjoys, and by means of which he can vary and enliven his Style. But he must take care that all such allusions be natural and easy; for if they seem forced, they approach to the nature of conceits.*

* Bishop Sherlock, when shewing that the views of reason have been enlarged, and the principles of natural religion illustrated, by the discoveries of Christianity, attacks unbelievers for the abuse they make of these advantages, in the following manner:—
“What a return do we make for those blessings we have received?
“How disrespectfully do we treat the Gospel of Christ, to which “we owe that clear light both of reason and nature, which we “now enjoy, when we endeavour to set up reason and nature in “opposition to it? Ought the withered hand, which Christ has “restored and made whole, to be lifted up against him?” Vol. 1.
Disc. i. This allusion to a noted miracle of our Lord’s appears

In a Sermon, no points or conceits should appear, no affected smartness and quaintness of expression. These derogate much from the dignity of the Pulpit; and give to a Preacher that air of foppishness, which he ought, above all things, to shun. It is rather a strong expressive Style, than a sparkling one, that is to be studied. But we must beware of imagining that we render Style strong or expressive, by a constant and multiplied use of epithets. This is a great error. Epithets have often great beauty and force. But if we introduce them into every Sentence, and string many of them together to one object, in place of strengthening, we clog and enfeeble Style; in place of illustrating the image, we render it confused and indistinct. He that tells me “of this perishing, mutable, and transitory world;” by all these three epithets, does not give me so strong an idea of what he would convey, as if he had used one of them with propriety. I conclude this head with an advice, never to have what may be called a favourite expression; for it shews affectation, and becomes disgusting. Let not any expression, which is remarkable for its lustre or beauty, occur twice in the same Discourse. The repetition of it betrays a fondness to shine, and, to me happy and elegant. Dr. Seed is remarkably fond of allusions to Scripture Style; but he sometimes employs such as are too fanciful and strained. As when he says (Serm. iv.), “No one great virtue will come single; the virtues that be her fellows will bear her company with joy and gladness:” alluding to a passage in the XLVth Psalm, which relates to the virgins, the companions of the king’s daughter. And (Serm. xiii.) having said, that the universities have justly been called the eyes of the nation, he adds, “and if the eyes of the nation be evil, the whole body of it must be full of darkness.” at the same time, carries the appearance of a barren invention.

As to the question, whether it be most proper to write Sermons fully, and commit them accurately to memory; or to study only the matter and thoughts, and trust the expression, in part at least, to the delivery? I am of opinion, that no universal rule can here be given. The choice of either of these methods must be left to Preachers, according to their different genius. The expressions which come warm and glowing from the mind, during the fervour of pronunciation, will often have a superior grace and energy, to those which are studied in the retirement of the closet. But then, this fluency and power of expression cannot, at all times, be depended upon, even by those of the readiest genius; and by many can at no time be commanded, when overawed by the presence of an Audience. It is proper therefore to begin, at least, the practice of preaching, with writing as accurately as possible. This is absolutely necessary in the beginning, in order to acquire the power and habit of correct speaking, nay, also of correct thinking, upon religious subjects. I am inclined to go further, and to say, that it is proper not only to begin thus but also to continue, as long as the habits of industry last, in the practice both of writing and committing to memory. Relaxation in this particular is so common, and so ready to grow upon most Speakers in the Pulpit, that there is little occasion for giving any cautions against the extreme of overdoing in accuracy.

Of pronunciation or delivery, I am hereafter to treat apart. All that I shall now say upon this head is, that the practice of reading Sermons, is one of the greatest obstacles to the Eloquence of the Pulpit in Great Britain, where alone this practice prevails. No discourse, which is designed to be persuasive, can have the same force when read, as when spoken. The common people all feel this, and their prejudice against this practice is not without foundation in nature. What is gained hereby in point of correctness, is not equal, I apprehend, to what is lost in point of persuasion and force. They, whose memories are not able to retain the whole of a Discourse, might aid themselves considerably by short notes lying before them, which would allow them to preserve, in a great measure, the freedom and ease of one who speaks.

The French and English writers of Sermons proceed upon very different ideas of the Eloquence of the Pulpit; and seem indeed to have split it betwixt them. A French Sermon is, for most part, a warm animated exhortation; an English one, is a piece of cool instructive reasoning. The French Preachers address themselves chiefly to the imagination and the passions; the English, almost solely to the understanding. It is the union of these two kinds of composition, of the French earnestness and warmth, with the English accuracy and reason, that would form, according to my idea, the model of a perfect Sermon. A French Sermon would sound in our ears as a florid, and, often, as an enthusiastic, harangue. The censure which, in fact, the French Critics pass on the English Preachers is, that they are Philosophers and Logicians, but not Orators.* The defects of most of the French Sermons are these: from a mode that prevails among them of taking their texts from the lesson of the day, the connection of the text with the subject is often unnatural and forced*; their applications of Scripture are fanciful rather than instructive; their method is stiff and cramped, by their practice of dividing their subject always either into three, or two, main points; and their composition is in general too diffuse, and consists rather of a very few thoughts spread out, and highly wrought up, than of a rich variety of sentiments. Admitting, however, all these defects, it cannot be denied that their sermons are formed upon the idea of a persuasive popular Oration; and therefore I am of opinion, they may be read with benefit.

* “ Les Sermons sont suivant notre methode, de vrais discours oratoires; & non pas, comme chez les Anglois, des discussions

Among the French Protestant divines, Saurin is the most distinguished: he is copious, eloquent, and devout, though too ostentatious in his manner. Among the Roman Catholics, the two most eminent are, Bourdaloue and Massillon. It is a subject of dispute among the French Critics, to which of these the preference is due, and each of them has his partisans. To Bourdaloue, they attribute more solidity and close reasoning; to Massillon, a more pleasing “metaphisiques plus convenables à une Academie, qu’aux Assemblées populaires qui se forment dans nos temples, et qu’il s’agit d’instruire des devoirs du Chrétianisme, d’encourager, de consolider, d’edifier.”

Rhetorique Française, par M. Crevier, tom. i. p. 134.

* One of Massillon’s best Sermons, that on the coldness and languor with which Christians perform the duties of religion, is preached from Luke, iv. 18. And he arose out of the Synagogue, and entered into Simon’s house; and Simon’s wife’s mother was taken ill with a great fever.

and engaging manner. Bourdaloue is indeed a great reasoner, and inculcates his doctrines with much zeal, piety, and earnestness; but his style is verbose, he is disagreeably full of quotations from the Fathers, and he wants imagination. Massillon has more grace, more sentiment, and, in my opinion, every way more genius. He discovers much knowledge both of the world and of the human heart; he is pathetic and persuasive; and upon the whole, is perhaps the most eloquent writer of Sermons which modern times have produced.*

* In order to give an idea of that kind of Eloquence which is employed by the French Preachers, I shall insert a passage from Massillon, which, in the Encyclopedie, (Article, Eloquence,) is extolled by Voltaire, who was the Author of that Article, as a chef d'œuvre, equal to any thing of which either ancient or modern times can boast. The subject of the Sermon is, the small number of those who shall be saved. The Strain of the whole discourse is extremely serious and animated; but when the Orator came to the passage which follows, Voltaire informs us, that the whole assembly were moved; that by a sort of involuntary motion, they started up from their seats, and that such murmurs of surprise and acclamations arose as disconcerted the Speaker, though they increased the effect of his Discourse.

“ Je m'arrête à vous, mes frères, qui êtes ici assemblés. Je ne “ parle plus du reste des hommes; je vous regarde comme si vous “ étiez seuls sur la terre: voici la pensée qui m'occupe & qui “ m'épouvante. Je suppose que c'est ici votre dernière heure, et “ la fin de l'univers; que les cieux vont s'ouvrir sur vos têtes, “ Jesus Christ paroître dans sa gloire au milieu de ce temple, et “ que vous n'y êtes assemblés que pour l'attendre, comme des “ criminels tremblans, à qui l'on va prononcer, ou un sentence “ de grace, ou un arrêt du mort. éternelle. Car vous avez beau “ vous flater; vous mouriez tels que vous êtes aujourd'hui. Tous “ ces désirs de changement que vous amusez, vous amuseront “ jusqu'au lit de la mort: c'est l'expérience de tous les siècles.
 “ Tout ce que vous trouverez alors en vous de nouveau, sera peut-

During the period that preceded the restoration of King Charles II. the Sermons of the English divines abounded with scholastic casuistical theology. They “ être un compte plus grand que celui que vous auriez aujourd’hui “ à rendre ; et sur ce que vous seriez, si l’on venoit vous juger “ dans ce moment, vous pouvez presque décider ce que vous arri“ vera au sortir de la vie.

“ Or, je vous le demande, et je vous le demande frappé de ter“ reur, ne separant pas en ce point mon sort du votre, et me “ mettant dans la même disposition, où je souhait que vous “ entriez ; je vous demande, donc, si Jesus Christ paroisoit dans “ ce temple, au milieu de cette Assemblée ; la plus auguste de “ l’univers, pour nous juger, pour faire le terrible discernement “ des boues et des brebis, croyez vous que le plus grand nombre “ de tout ce que nous sommes ici, fut placé à la droite ? Croyez “ vous que les choses du moins fussent égales ? croyez vous qu’il “ s’y trouvât seulement dix justes, que le Seigneur ne peut trou-“ ver autrefois en cinq villes toutes entières ? Je vous le demande ;
“ vous l’ignorez, et je l’ignore moi-même. Vous seul, O mon “ Dieu ! connoissez que vous appartienent. — Mes frères, notre “ perte, est presque assurée, et nous n’y pensons pas. Quand même “ dans cette terrible séparation qui se sera un jour, il ne devoit y “ avoir qu’un seul pêcheur de cet Assemblée du côté des réprouvés, “ et qu’une voix du ciel viendroit nous en assurer dans ce Temple, “ sans le désigner ; qui de nous ne craindroit d’être de malheu-“ reux ? qui de nous ne retomberoit d’abord, sur la conscience, “ pour examiner si ses crimes n’ont pas mérités ce châtement ? qui “ de nous, sasié de frayeur, ne demanderoit pas à Jesus Christ “ comme autrefois les Apôtres ; Seigneur, ne seroit-ce pas moi ?
“ Sommes nous sages, mes chers Auditeurs ? peut-être que parmi “ tous ceux qui m’entendent, il ne se trouvera pas dix justes ; peut-“ être s’en trouvera-t-il encore moins. Que sai-je, O mon Dieu ! je “ n’ose regarder d’un œil fixe les abismes de vos jugemens, et de “ votre justice ; peut-être ne s’en trouvera-t-il qu’un seul ; et ce “ danger ne vous touche point, mon cher Auditeur ? et vous “ croyez être ce seul heureux dans la grand nombre qui perira ?
“ vous qui avez moins sujet de le croire que tout autre ; vous sur “ qui seul la sentence de mort devoit tomber. Grand Dieu ! qui were full of minute divisions and subdivisions, and scraps of learning in the didactic part; but to these were joined very warm pathetic addresses to the consciences of the Hearers, in the applicatory part of the Sermon. Upon the Restoration, preaching assumed a more correct and polished form. It became disencumbered from the pedantry and scholastic divisions of the sectaries; but it threw out also their warm and pathetic addresses, and established itself wholly upon the model of cool reasoning, and rational instruction. As the Dissenters from the Church continued to preserve somewhat of the old strain of preaching, this led the established Clergy to depart the farther from it. Whatever was earnest and passionate, either in the composition or delivery of Sermons, was reckoned enthusiastic and fanatical; and hence that argumentative manner, bordering on the dry and unpersuasive, which is too generally the character of English Sermons. Nothing can be more correct upon that model than many of them are; but the model itself on which they are formed,

“ P'on connoit peu dans la monde les terreurs de votre loi, &c.—
 After this awakening and alarming exhortation, the Orator comes with propriety to this practical improvement: “ Mais que conclure des ces grands verités? qu'il faut desesperer de son salut? a Dieu ne plaise; il n'y a que l'impie, qui pour se calmer sur ses desordres, tache ici de conclure en secret que tous les hommes periront comme lui; ce ne doit pas être là le fruits de ce discours. Mais de vous detromper de cette erreur si universelle, qu'on peut faire ce que tous les autres font; et que l'usage est une voie sure; mais de vous convaincre que pour se sauver, il faut de distinguer des autres; être singulier, vivre à part au milieu du monde, et ne pas ressembler à la foule.” is a confined and imperfect one. Dr. Clark, for instance, every where abounds in good sense, and the most clear and accurate reasoning; his applications of Scripture are pertinent; his Style is always perspicuous, and often elegant; he instructs and he convinces; in what then is he deficient? In nothing, except in the power of interesting and seizing the heart. He shews you what you ought to do; but he excites not the desire of doing it: he treats man as if he were a being of pure intellect, without imagination or passions. Archbishop Tillotson's manner is more free and warm, and he approaches nearer than most of the English divines to the character of Popular Speaking. Hence he is, to this day, one of the best models we have for preaching. We must not indeed consider him in the light of a perfect Orator: his composition is too loose and remiss; his style too feeble, and frequently too flat, to deserve that high character; but there is in some of his Sermons so much warmth and earnestness, and through them all there runs so much ease and perspicuity, such a vein of good sense and sincere piety, as justly entitle him to be held as eminent a Preacher as England has produced.

Sermons de MASSILLON, Vol. IV.

In Dr. Barrow, one admires more the prodigious fecundity of his invention, and the uncommon strength and force of his conceptions, than the felicity of his execution, or his talent in composition. We see a genius far surpassing the common, peculiar indeed almost to himself; but that genius often shooting wild, and unchastised by any discipline or study of Eloquence.

I cannot attempt to give particular characters of that great number of Writers of Sermons which this and the former age have produced, among whom we meet with a variety of the most respectable names. We find in their composition much that deserves praise; a great display of abilities of different kinds, much good sense and piety, strong reasoning, sound divinity, and useful instruction; though, in general, the degree of Eloquence bears not, perhaps, equal proportion to the goodness of the matter. Bishop Atterbury deserves to be particularly mentioned as a model of correct and beautiful Style, besides having the merit of a warmer and more eloquent strain of writing, in some of his Sermons, than is commonly met with. Had Bishop Butler, in place of abstract philosophical essays, given us more Sermons in the strain of those two excellent ones which he has composed upon Self-deceit, and upon the character of Balaam, we should then have pointed him out as distinguished for that species of characteristical Sermons which I before recommended.

Though the writings of the English divines are very proper to be read by such as are designed for the Church, I must caution them against making too much use of them, or transcribing large passages from them into the Sermons they compose. Such as once indulge themselves in this practice, will never have any fund of their own. Infinitely better it is, to venture into the pulpit with thoughts and expressions which have occurred to themselves, though of inferior beauty, than to disfigure their compositions by borrowed and ill-sorted ornaments, which, to a judicious eye, will be always in hazard of discovering their own poverty. When a Preacher sits down to write on any subject, never let him begin with seeking to consult all who have written on the same text or subject. This, if he consult many, will throw perplexity and confusion into his ideas; and, if he consults only one, will often warp him insensibly into his method, whether it be right or not. But let him begin with pondering the subject in his own thoughts; let him endeavour to fetch materials from within; to collect and arrange his ideas; and form some sort of plan to himself; which it is always proper to put down in writing. Then, and not till then, he may inquire how others have treated the same subject. By this means, the method, and the leading thoughts in the Sermon, are likely to be his own. These thoughts he may improve by comparing them with the track of sentiments which others have pursued; some of their sense he may, without blame, incorporate into his composition; retaining always his own words and style. This is fair assistance: all beyond is plagiarism.

On the whole, never let the capital principle, with which we set out at first, be forgotten, to keep close in view the great end for which a Preacher mounts the Pulpit; even to infuse good dispositions into his hearers, to persuade them to serve God, and to become better men. Let this always dwell on his mind when he is composing, and it will diffuse through his compositions that spirit which will render them at once esteemed and useful. The most useful Preacher is always the best, and will not fail of being esteemed so. Embellish truth only with a view to gain it the more full and free admission into your hearers' minds; and your ornaments will, in that case, be simple, masculine, natural. The best applause, by far, which a Preacher can receive, arises from the serious and deep impressions which his discourse leaves on those who hear it. The finest encomium, perhaps, ever bestowed on a Preacher, was given by Louis XIV. to the eloquent Bishop of Clermont, Father Massilon, whom I before mentioned with so much praise. After hearing him preach at Versailles, he said to him “ Father, I have “ heard many great Orators in this chapel; I have “ been highly pleased with them; but for you, “ whenever I hear you, I go away displeas’d with “ myself; for I see more of my own character.”

LECTURE XXX.

CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF A SERMON OF BISHOP ATTERBURY’S.

THE last Lecture was employ’d in observations on the peculiar and distinguishing Characters of the Eloquence proper for the Pulpit. But as rules and directions, when deliver’d in the abstract, are never so useful as when they are illustrat’d by particular instances, it may, perhaps, be of some benefit to those who are design’d for the Church, that I should analyse an English Sermon, and consider the matter of it, together with the manner. For this purpose I have chosen Bishop Atterbury as my example, who is deservedly account’d one of our most eloquent writers of Sermons, and whom I mentioned as such in the last Lecture. At the same time, he is more distinguished for elegance and purity of expression, than for profoundness of thought. His style, though sometimes careless, is, upon the whole, neat and chaste; and more beautiful than that of most writers of Sermons. In his sentiments he is not only rational, but pious and devotional, which is a great excellency. The Sermon which I have singled out, is that upon Praise and Thanksgiving, the first Sermon of the first Volume, which is reckoned one of his best. In examining it, it is necessary that I should use full liberty, and, together with the beauties, point out any defects that occur to me in the matter, as well as in the Style.

PSALM l. 14. Offer unto God Thanksgiving.

“ AMONG the many excellencies of this pious collection of hymns, for which so particular a value hath been set upon it by the Church of God in all ages, this is not the least, that the true price of duties is there justly stated: men are called off from resting in the outward show of religion, in ceremonies and ritual observances; and taught, rather to practise (that which was shadowed out by these rites, and to which they are designed to lead) sound inward piety and virtue.

“ The several composers of these Hymns were Prophets; persons, whose business it was not only to foretel events for the benefit of the Church in succeeding times, but to correct and reform also what was amiss among that race of men with whom they lived and conversed; to preserve a foolish people from idolatry, and false worship; to rescue the law

“ from corrupt glosses, and superstitious abuses ; and “ to put men in mind of (what they are so willing “ to forget) that eternal and invariable rule, which “ was before these positive duties, would continue “ after them, and was to be observed, even then, in “ preference to them.

“ The discharge, I say, of this part of the prophetic “ office taking up so much room in the book of “ Psalms ; this hath been one reason, among many “ others, why they have always been so highly “ esteemed ; because we are from hence furnished “ with a proper reply to an argument commonly “ made use of by unbelievers, who look upon all “ revealed religions as pious frauds and impostures,
“ on the account of the prejudices they have enter“ tained in relation to that of the Jews ; the whole “ of which they first suppose to lie in external “ performances, and then easily persuade them“ selves, that God could never be the Author of such “ a mere piece of pageantry and empty formality ; nor “ delight in a worship which consisted purely in a “ number of odd unaccountable ceremonies. Which “ objection of theirs, we should not be able thoroughly “ to answer, unless we could prove (chiefly out of
“ the Psalms, and other parts of the prophetic “ writings) that the Jewish religion was somewhat “ more than bare outside and show ; and that inward “ purity, and the devotion of the heart, was a duty
“ then, as well as now.”

This appears to me an excellent Introduction. The thought on which it rests is solid and judicious : that in the book of Psalms, the attention of men is called to the moral and spiritual part of religion ; and the Jewish dispensation thereby vindicated from the suspicion of requiring nothing more from its votaries, than the observance of the external rites and ceremonies of the law. Such views of religion are proper to be often displayed; and deserve to be insisted on, by all who wish to render preaching conducive to the great purpose of promoting righteousness and virtue. The Style, as far as we have gone, is not only free from faults, but elegant and happy.

It is a great beauty in an Introduction, when it can be made to turn on some one thought, fully brought out and illustrated; especially, if that thought has a close connection with the following discourse, and, at the same time, does not anticipate any thing that is afterwards to be introduced in a more proper place. This Introduction of Atterbury's has all these advantages. The encomium which he makes on the strain of David's Psalms is not such as might as well have been prefixed to any other discourse, the text of which was taken from any of the Psalms. Had this been the case, the Introduction would have lost much of its beauty. We shall see from what follows how naturally the introductory thought connects with his text, and how happily it ushers it in.

“ One great instance of this proof, we have in the “ words now before us: which are taken from a “ Psalm of Asaph, written on purpose to set out the “ weakness and worthlessness of external perform“ ances, when compared with more substantial and “ vital duties. To enforce which doctrine, God “ himself is brought in as delivering it. Hear, O
 “ my people, and I will speak; O Israel, and I will “ testify against thee: I am God, even thy God. The “ Preface is very solemn, and therefore what it “ ushers in, we may be sure is of no common import“ance; I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices or “thy burnt-offerings, to have been continually before “me. That is, I will not so reprove thee for any “failures in thy sacrifices and burnt offerings, as if “these were the only, or the chief things I required

 “of thee. I will take no bullock out of thy house,
 “nor he-goat out of thy folds; I prescribed not sacri“fices to thee for my own sake, because I needed “them; For every beast of the forest is mine, and the “cattle on a thousand hills. Mine they are, and “were, before I commanded thee to offer them to “me; so that, as it follows, If I were hungry, yet
 “would I not tell thee; for the world is mine, and the “fullness thereof. But can ye be so gross and sense“less, as to think me liable to hunger and thirst?
 “as to imagine that wants of that kind can touch “me? Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the “blood of goats? — Thus doth he expostulate “severely with them, after the most graceful “manner of the Eastern Poetry. The issue of “which is a plain and full resolution of the case, in “those few words of the text — Offer unto God “thanksgiving. Would you do your homage the “most agreeable way? would you render the most “acceptable of services? offer unto God thanks- “giving.”

It is often a difficult matter to illustrate gracefully the text of a Sermon from the context, and to point out the connection between them. This is a part of the discourse which is apt to become dry and tedious, especially when pursued into a minute commentary.
 And therefore, except as far as such illustration from the context is necessary for explaining the meaning, or in cases where it serves to give dignity and force to the text, I would advise that it be always treated with brevity. Sometimes it may even be wholly omitted, and the text assumed merely as an independent proposition, if the connection with the context be obscure, and would require a laborious explanation. In the present case, the illustration from the context is singularly happy. The passage of the Psalm on which it is founded is noble and spirited, and connected in such a manner with the text, as to introduce it with a very striking emphasis. On the language I have little to observe, except that the phrase, one great instance of this proof, is a clumsy expression. It was sufficient to have said, one great proof, or one great instance of this. In the same sentence, when he speaks of setting out the weakness and worthlessness of external performances, we may observe, that the word worthlessness, as it is now commonly used, signifies more than the deficiency of worth, which is all that the Author means. It generally imports, a considerable degree of badness or blame. It would be more proper, therefore, to say, the imperfection, or the insignificancy, of external performances.

“ The use I intend to make of these words, is,
 “ from hence to raise some thoughts about that very “ excellent and important duty of Praise and “ Thanksgiving, a subject not unfit to be discoursed “ of at this time; whether we consider, either the “ more than ordinary coldness that appears of late in “ men’s tempers towards the practice of this (or any “ other) part of a warm and affecting devotion; the “ great occasion of setting aside this particular day “ in the calendar, some years ago; or the new “ instances of mercy and goodness, which God hath “ lately been pleased to bestow upon us; answering “ at last the many prayers and fastings, by which “ we have besought him so long for the establish“ ment of their Majesties’ Throne, and for the suc“ cess of their arms; and giving us in his good time,

 “ an opportunity of appearing before him in the “ more delightful part of our duty, with the voice “ of joy and praise, with a multitude that keep holi- “ days.”

In this paragraph there is nothing remarkable: no particular beauty or neatness of expression; and the Sentence which it forms is long and tiresome. — To raise some thoughts about that very excellent, &c. is rather loose and awkward; — better — to recommend that very excellent, &c.; and when he mentions setting aside a particular day in the calendar, one would imagine, that setting apart would have been more proper, as to set aside, seems rather to suggest a different idea.

“ Offer unto God thanksgiving. — Which that we “ may do, let us inquire first, how we are to under- “ stand this command of offering Praise and Thanks“ giving unto God; and then how reasonable it is “ that we should comply with it.”

This is the general division of the discourse. An excellent one it is, and corresponds to many subjects of this kind, where particular duties are to be treated of; first to explain, and then to recommend or enforce them. A division should always be simple and natural; and much depends on the proper view which it gives of the subject.

“ Our inquiry into what is meant here, will be “ very short; for who is there, that understands any “ thing of religion, but knows, that the offering

“ praise and thanks to God, implies, our having a “ lively and devout sense of his excellencies, and of “ his benefits; our recollecting them with humility
“ and thankfulness of heart; and our expressing “ these inward affections by suitable outward signs,
“ by reverent and lowly postures of body, by songs
“ and hymns, and spiritual ejaculations; either pub“ licly or privately; either in the customary and “ daily service of the Church, or in its more solemn “ assemblies, convened upon extraordinary occa“ sions? This is the account which every Christian “ easily gives himself of it; and which therefore, it “ would be needless to enlarge upon. I shall only “ take notice upon this head, that Praise and “ Thanksgiving do, in strictness of speech, signify “ things somewhat different. Our praise properly “ terminates in God, on account of his natural “ excellencies and perfections; and is that act of “ devotion, by which we confess and admire his “ several attributes: but thanksgiving is a nar“ rower duty, and imports only a grateful sense and “ acknowledgment of past mercies. We praise God
“ for all his glorious acts of every kind, that regard “ either us or other men; for his very vengeance, “ and those judgments which he sometimes sends “ abroad in the earth; but we thank him, properly “ speaking, for the instances of his goodness alone;
“ and for such only of these as we ourselves are “ someway concerned in. This, I say, is what the “ two words strictly imply; but since the language
“ of Scripture is generally less exact, and useth “ either of them often to express the other by, I “ shall not think myself obliged, in what follows,
“ thus nicely always to distinguish them.”

There was room here for insisting more fully on the nature of the duty than the Author has done under this head; in particular, this was the place for correcting the mistake, to which men are always prone, of making Thanksgiving to consist merely in outward expressions; and for showing them, that the essence of the duty lies in the inward feelings of the heart. In general, it is of much use to give full and distinct explications of religious duties. But, as our Author intended only one discourse on the subject, he could not enlarge with equal fullness on every part of it; and he has chosen to dwell on that part on which indeed it is most necessary to enlarge, the motives enforcing the duty. For, as it is an easier matter to know, than to practise duty, the persuasive part of the discourse is that to which the Speaker should always bend his chief strength. The account given in this head of the nature of Praise and Thanksgiving, though short, is yet comprehensive and distinct, and the language is smooth and elegant.

“ Now the great reasonableness of this duty of Praise or Thanksgiving, and our several obligations to it, will appear, if we either consider it absolutely in itself, as the debt of our natures; or compare it with other duties, and shew the rank it bears among them; or set out, in the last place, some of its peculiar properties and advantages, with regard to the devout performer of it.”

The Author here enters upon the main part of his subject, the reasonableness of the duty, and mentions three arguments for proving it. These are well stated, and are in themselves proper and weighty considerations. How far he has handled each of them to advantage, will appear as we proceed. I cannot, however, but think that he has omitted one very material part of the argument, which was to have shewn the obligations we are under to this duty, from the various subjects of Thanksgiving afforded us by the divine goodness. This would have led him to review the chief benefits of Creation, Providence, and Redemption: and certainly, they are these which lay the foundation of the whole argument for Thanksgiving. The heart must first be affected with a suitable sense of the divine benefits, before one can be excited to praise God. If you would persuade me to be thankful to a benefactor, you must not employ such considerations merely as those upon which the Author here rests, taken from gratitude's being the law of my nature, or bearing a high rank among moral duties, or being attended with peculiar advantages. These are considerations but of a secondary nature. You must begin with setting before me all that my friend has done for me, if you mean to touch my heart, and to call forth the emotions of gratitude. The case is perfectly similar, when we are exhorted to give thanks to God; and, therefore, in giving a full view of the subject, the blessings conferred on us by divine goodness should have been taken into the argument.

It may be said, however, in apology for our Author, that this would have led him into too wide a field for one discourse, and into a field also, which is difficult, because so beaten, the enumeration of the divine benefits. He, therefore seems to take it for granted, that we have upon our minds a just sense of these benefits. He assumes them as known and acknowledged; and setting aside what may be called the pathetic part of the subject, or what was calculated to warm the heart, he goes on to the reasoning part. In this management, I cannot altogether blame him. I do not by any means say, that it is necessary in every discourse to take in all that belongs to the doctrine of which we treat. Many a discourse is spoiled, by attempting to render it too copious and comprehensive. The Preacher may, without reprehension, take up any part of a great subject to which his genius at the time leads him, and make that his theme. But when he omits any thing which may be thought essential, he ought to give notice, that this is a part, which for the time he lays aside. Something of this sort would perhaps have been proper here. Our Author might have begun by saying, that the reasonableness of this duty must appear to every thinking being, who reflects upon the infinite obligations which are laid upon us, by creating, preserving, and redeeming love; and, after taking notice that the field which these open, was too wide for him to enter upon at that time, have proceeded to his other heads. Let us now consider these separately:

“ The duty of Praise and Thanksgiving, considered absolutely in itself, is, I say, the debt and law of our nature. We had such faculties bestowed on us by our Creator, as made us capable of satisfying this debt, and obeying this law; and they never, therefore, work more naturally and freely, than when they are thus employed.

“ 'Tis one of the earliest instructions given us by philosophy, and which hath ever since been approved and inculcated by the wisest men of all ages, that the original design of making man was, that he might praise and honour him who made “ him. When God had finished this goodly frame “ of things we call the world, and put together the “ several parts of it, according to his infinite wisdom, “ in exact number, weight and measure, there was “ still wanting a creature, in these lower regions,

 “ that could apprehend the beauty, order and exqui“ site contrivance of it; that from contemplating
 “ the gift, might be able to raise itself to the great “ Giver, and do honour to all his attributes. Every “ thing indeed that God made, did in some sense, “ glorify its Author, inasmuch as it carried upon it
 “ the plain mark and impress of the Deity, and was “ an effect worthy of that first cause from whence it “ flowed; and thus might the Heavens be said, at “ the first moment in which they stood forth, to “ declare his glory, and the firmament to show his “ handy-work: But this was an imperfect and defec“ tive glory; the sign was of no signification here “ below, whilst there was no one here as yet to take “ notice of it. Man, therefore, was formed to sup“ ply this want, endowed with powers fit to find out,
 “ and to acknowledge these unlimited perfections;
 “ and then put into this Temple of God, this lower “ world, as the Priest of Nature, to offer up the “ incense of Thanks and Praise for the mute and “ insensible part of the Creation.

“ This, I say, hath been the opinion all along of “ the most thoughtful men down from the most “ ancient times: and though it be not demonstrative, “ yet it is what we cannot but judge highly reason“ able, if we do but allow, that man was made for “ some end or other; and that he is capable of per“ ceiving that end. For, then, let us search and “ enquire never so much, we shall find no other “ account of him that we can rest upon so well. If “ we say, that he was made purely for the good “ pleasure of God ; this is, in effect, to say, that he “ was made for no determinate end, or for none, at “ least, that we can discern. If we say, that he was “ designed as an instance of the wisdom, and power,

 “ and goodness of God ; this, indeed, may be the “ reason of his being in general ; for ’tis the common “ reason of the being of every thing besides. But it “ gives no account, why he was made such a being as “ he is, a reflecting, thoughtful, inquisitive being.
 “ The particular reason of this seems most aptly to “ be drawn from the praise and honour that was “ (not only to redound to God from him, but) to be “ given to God by him.”

The thought which runs through all this passage, of man’s being the Priest of Nature, and of his existence being calculated chiefly for this end, that he might offer up the praises of the mute part of the creation, is an ingenious thought, and well illustrated. It was a favourite idea among some of the ancient philosophers ; and it is not the worse on that account, as it thereby appears to have been a natural sentiment of the human mind. In composing a Sermon, however, it might have been better to have introduced it as a sort of collateral argument, or an incidental illustration, than to have displayed it with so much pomp, and to have placed it in the front of the arguments for this duty. It does not seem to me, when placed in this station, to bear all the stress which the Author lays upon it. When the divine goodness brought man into existence, we cannot well conceive that its chief purpose was to form a being who might sing praises to his Maker. Prompted by infinite benevolence, the Supreme Creator formed the human race, that they might rise to happiness, and to the enjoyment of himself, through a course of virtue, or proper action. The sentiment on which our Author dwells, however beautiful, appears too loose and rhetorical, to be a principal head of discourse.

“ This duty, therefore, is the debt and law of our nature. And it will more distinctly appear to be such, if we consider the two ruling faculties of our mind, the Understanding and the Will apart, in both which it is deeply founded: in the Understanding, as in the principle of Reason, which owns and acknowledges it; in the Will, as in the fountain of gratitude and return, which prompts, and even constrains us to pay it.

“ Reason was given us as a rule and measure, by the help of which we were to proportion our esteem of every thing, according to the degrees of perfection and goodness which we found therein. It cannot, therefore, if it doth its office at all, but apprehend God as the best and most perfect being; it must needs see and own and admire his infinite perfections. And this is what is strictly meant by praise; which, therefore, is expressed in Scripture, by confessing to God, and acknowledging him; by ascribing to him what is his due; and as far as this sense of the words reaches, 'tis impossible to think of God without praising him: for it depends not on the understanding, how it shall apprehend things, any more than it doth on the eye, how visible objects shall appear to it.

“ The duty takes the further and surer hold of us, by the means of the will, and that strong bent towards gratitude, which the Author of our nature “ hath implanted in it. There is not a more active “ principle than this in the mind of man ; and surely “ that which deserves its utmost force, and should “ set all its springs a-work, is God ; the great and “ universal Benefactor, from whom alone we received “ whatever we either have, or are, and to whom we “ can possibly repay nothing but our Praises, or (to “ speak more properly on this head, and according “ to the strict import of the word) our Thanksgiving:

 “ Who hath first given to God (saith the great Apostle “ in his usual figure) and it shall be recompensed unto “ him again? A gift, it seems, always requires a “ recompence : nay, but of him, and through him, and
 “ to him, are all things : of him, as the Author ; through “ him, as the Preserver and Governor ; to him, as “ the end and perfection of all things : to whom there- “ fore (as it follows), be glory for ever, Amen !”

I cannot much approve of the light in which our Author places his argument in these paragraphs.
 There is something too metaphysical and refined, in his deducing, in this manner, the obligation to thanksgiving, from the two faculties of the mind, Understanding and Will. Though what he says be in itself just, yet the argument is not sufficiently plain and striking. Arguments in Sermons, especially on subjects that so naturally and easily suggest them, should be palpable and popular ; should not be brought from topics that appear far sought, but should directly address the heart and feelings. The Preacher ought never to depart too far from the common ways of thinking, and expressing himself.
 I am inclined to think, that this whole head might have been improved, if the Author had taken up more obvious ground ; had stated Gratitude as one of the most natural principles in the human heart; had illustrated this, by shewing how odious the opposite disposition is, and with what general consent men, in all ages, have agreed in hating and condemning the ungrateful; and then applying these reasonings to the present case, had placed in a strong view, that entire corruption of moral sentiment which it discovers, to be destitute of thankful emotions towards the supreme Benefactor of Mankind. As the most natural method of giving vent to grateful sentiments is, by external expressions of thanksgiving, he might then have answered the objection that is apt to occur, of the expression of our praise being insignificant to the Almighty. But, by seeking to be too refined in his argument, he has omitted some of the most striking and obvious considerations, and which, properly displayed, would have afforded as great a field for Eloquence, as the topics which he has chosen. He goes on.

“ Gratitude consists in an equal return of benefits, “ if we are able; of thanks, if we are not: which “ thanks, therefore, must rise always in proportion
 “ as the favours received are great, and the receiver “ incapable of making any other sort of requital.
 “ Now, since no man hath benefited God at any “ time, and yet every man, in each moment of his “ life, is continually benefited by him, what strong “ obligations must we needs be under to thank him?
 “ ’Tis true, our thanks are really as insignificant to “ him, as any other kind of return would be; in “ themselves, indeed, they are worthless; but his “ goodness hath put a value upon them: he hath “ declared, he will accept them in lieu of the vast “ debt we owe; and after that, which is fittest for “ us, to dispute how they came to be taken as an “ equivalent, or to pay them ?

“ It is, therefore, the voice of nature (as far as “ gratitude itself is so), that the good things we “ receive from above should be sent back again “ thither in thanks and praises; as the rivers run “ into the sea, to the place (the ocean of beneficence) “ from whence the rivers come, thither should they “ return again.”

In these paragraphs, he has, indeed, touched some of the considerations which I mentioned. But he has only touched them; whereas, with advantage, they might have formed the main body of his argument.

“ We have considered the duty absolutely; we are “ now to compare it with others, and to see what “ rank it bears among them. And here we shall “ find, that, among all the acts of religion immedi“ ately addressed to God, this is much the noblest “ and most excellent; as it must needs be, if what “ hath been laid down be allowed, that the end of “ man’s creation was to praise and glorify God. For “ that cannot but be the most noble and excellent “ act of any being, which best answers the end and “ design of it. Other parts of devotion, such as “ confession and prayer, seem not originally to have “ been designed for man, nor man for them. They “ imply guilt and want, with which the state of inno- “ cence was not acquainted. Had man continued in “ that estate, his worship (like the devotions of “ angels) had been paid to Heaven in pure acts of “ thanksgiving; and nothing had been left for him
 “ to do, beyond the enjoying the good things of life,
 “ as nature directed, and praising the God of nature
 “ who bestowed them. But being fallen from inno“ cence and abundance; having contracted guilt,

 “ and forfeited his right to all sorts of mercies;
 “ prayer and confession became necessary, for a “ time, to retrieve the loss, and to restore him to “ that state wherein he should be able to live without “ them. These are fitted, therefore, for a lower “ dispensation; before which, in paradise, there was “ nothing but praise, and after which, there shall be “ nothing but that in Heaven. Our perfect state “ did at first, and will at last, consist in the per“ formance of this duty; and herein, therefore, lies
 “ the excellence and the honour of our nature.

“ ’Tis the same way of reasoning, by which the “ Apostle hath given the preference to charity, “ beyond faith, and hope, and every spiritual gift.
 “ Charity never faileth, saith he; meaning that it is “ not a virtue useful only in this life; but will “ accompany us also into the next: but whether “ there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there “ be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be know- “ ledge, it shall vanish away. These are gifts of “ a temporary advantage, and shall all perish in “ the using. For we know in part, and we prophesy
 “ in part; our present state is imperfect, and there- “ fore, what belongs to that, and only that, must be “ imperfect too. But when that which is perfect is “ come, then that which is in part shall be done away.
 “ The argument of St. Paul, we see, which sets “ charity above the rest of Christian graces, will “ give praise also the pre-eminence over all the parts “ of Christian worship; and we may conclude our “ reasoning, therefore, as he doth his; And now “ abideth confession, prayer, and praise, these three;
 “ but the greatest of these is praise.”

The Author here enters on the second part of his argument, the high rank which thanksgiving holds, when compared with other duties of religion. This he handles with much eloquence and beauty. His idea, that this was the original worship of man before his fall rendered other duties requisite, and shall continue to be his worship in Heaven, when the duties which are occasioned by a consciousness of guilt shall have no place, is solid and just; his illustration of it is very happy; and the style extremely flowing and sweet. Seldom do we meet with any piece of composition in Sermons, that has more merit than this head.

“ It is so, certainly, on other accounts, as well as “ this; particularly, as it is the most disinterested “ branch of our religious service; such as hath the “ most of God, and the least of ourselves in it, of “ any we pay; and therefore approaches the nearest “ of any to a pure, and free, and perfect act of “ homage. For though a good action doth not grow “ immediately worthless by being done with the pros“ pect of advantage, as some have strangely ima“ gined; yet it will be allowed, I suppose, that its “ being done, without the mixture of that end, or “ with as little of it as possible, recommends it so “ much the more, and raises the price of it. Doth “ Job fear God for nought? was an objection of “ Satan; which implied that those duties were most “ valuable, where our own interest was least aimed “ at: and God seems, by the commission he then “ gave Satan, to try experiments upon Job, thus far “ to have allowed his plea. Now, our requests for “ future, and even our acknowledgments of past “ mercies, centre purely in ourselves; our own

“ interest is the direct aim of them. But praise “ is a generous and unmercenary principle, which “ proposes no other end to itself, but to do, as is “ fit for a creature endowed with such faculties “ to do towards the most perfect and beneficent of “ beings; and to pay the willing tribute of honour
 “ there, where the voice of Reason directs us to pay “ it. God hath, indeed, annexed a blessing to the “ duty; and when we know this, we cannot chuse, “ while we are performing the duty, but have some “ regard to the blessing which belongs to it. How“ ever, that is not the direct aim of our devotions, “ nor was it the first motive that stirred us up to “ them. Had it been so, we should naturally have “ betaken ourselves to Prayer, and breathed out our “ desires in that form wherein they are most properly “ conveyed.

“ In short, Praise is our most excellent work, a “ work common to the church triumphant and mili“ tant, and which lifts us up into communion and “ fellowship with Angels. The matter about which “ it is conversant, is always the perfection of God’s “ nature; and the act itself, is the perfection of “ ours.”

Our Author’s second illustration is taken from praise being the most disinterested act of homage.
 This he explains justly and elegantly; though, perhaps, the consideration is rather too thin and refined for enforcing religious duties: as creatures, such as we, in approaching to the divine presence, can never be supposed to lay aside all consideration of our own wants and necessities; and certainly are not required (as the Author admits) to divest ourselves of such regards. The concluding Sentence of this head is elegant and happily expressed.

“ I come now in the last place, to set out some of its peculiar properties and advantages, which recommend it to the devout performer. And,

“ 1. It is the most pleasing part of our devotions : it proceeds always from a lively cheerful temper of mind, and it cherishes and improves what it proceeds from. For it is good to sing praises unto our God (says one whose experience, in this case, we may rely upon), for it is pleasant, and praise is comely. Petition and confession are the language of the indigent and the guilty, the breathings of a sad and contrite spirit : Is any afflicted? let him pray ; but, Is any merry? let him sing psalms. The most usual and natural way of men’s expressing the mirth of their hearts is in a song, and songs are the very language of praise ; to the expressing of which they are in a peculiar manner appropriated, and are scarce of any other use in Religion. Indeed, the whole composition of this duty is such, as throughout speaks ease and delight to the mind. It proceeds from Love, and from Thankfulness ; from Love, the fountain of pleasure, the passion which gives every thing we do, or enjoy, its relish and agreeableness. From Thankfulness, which involves in it the memory of past benefits, the actual presence of them to the mind, and the repeated enjoyment of them. And as is its principle, such is its end also : for it procureth quiet and ease to the mind, by doing somewhat towards satisfying that debt which it labours under ; by delivering it of those thoughts of praise and gra“titude, those exultations it is so full of; and which “would grow uneasy and troublesome to it, if they “were kept in. If the thankful refrained, it would “be pain and grief to them; but then, then is their “soul satisfied as with marrow and fatness, when their “mouth praiseth God with joyful lips.”

In beginning this head of discourse, the expression which the Author uses, to set out some of its peculiar properties and advantages, would now be reckoned not so proper an expression, as to point out, or to shew. The first subdivision concerning praise being the most pleasant part of devotion, is very just and well expressed, as far as it goes; but seems to me rather defective. Much more might have been said, upon the pleasure that accompanies such exalted acts of devotion. It was a cold thought, to dwell upon its disburdening the mind of a debt. The Author should have insisted more upon the influence of Praise and Thanksgiving, in warming, gladdening, soothing the mind; lifting it above the world; to dwell among divine and eternal objects. He should have described the peace and joy which then expand the heart; the relief which this exercise procures from the cares and agitations of life; the encouraging views of Providence to which it leads our attention; and the trust which it promotes in the divine mercy for the future, by the commemoration of benefits past. In short, this was the place for his pouring out a greater flow of devotional sentiments than what we here find.

“2. It is another distinguishing property of divine “praise, that it enlargeth the powers and capacities
 “of our souls, turning them from low and little “things, upon their greatest and noblest object, the “divine nature, and employing them in the dis“covery and admiration of those several perfections “that adorn it. We see what difference there is “between man and man, such as there is hardly “greater between man and beast: and this proceeds “chiefly from the different sphere of thought which “they act in, and the different objects they converse “with. The mind is essentially the same in the “peasant and the prince; the force of it naturally “equal, in the untaught man, and the philosopher;

 “only the one of these is busied in mean affairs, and “within narrower bounds; the other exercises him“self in things of weight and moment; and this it “is, that puts the wide distance between them.
 “Noble objects are to the mind, what the sun-beams
 “are to a bud or flower; they open and unfold, as it “were, the leaves of it; put it upon exerting and “spreading itself every way; and call forth all those “powers that lie hid and locked up in it. The “praise and admiration of God, therefore, brings “this advantage along with it, that it sets our “faculties upon their full stretch, and improves them “to all the degrees of perfection of which they are “capable.”

This head is just, well expressed, and to censure it might appear hypercritical. Some of the expressions, however, one would think, might be amended.
 The simile, for instance, about the effects of the sun-beams upon the bud or flower, is pretty, but not correctly expressed. They open and unfold, as it were, the leaves of it. If this is to be literally applied to the flower, the phrase, as it were, is needless; if it is to be metaphorically understood (which appears to be the case), the leaves of the mind, is harsh language; besides that, put it upon exerting itself, is rather a low expression. Nothing is more nice, than to manage properly such similies and allusions, so as to preserve them perfectly correct, and at the same time to render the image lively: it might perhaps be amended in some such way as this: “As the sun“ beams open the bud, and unfold the leaves of a “ flower, noble objects have a like effect upon the “ mind: they expand and spread it, and call forth “ those powers that before lay hid and locked up in “ the soul.”

“ 3. It farther promotes in us an exquisite sense
 “ of God’s honour, and an high indignation of mind
 “ at every thing that openly profanes it. For what “ we value and delight in, we cannot with patience “ hear slighted or abused. Our own praises, which “ we are constantly putting up, will be a spur to us “ towards procuring and promoting the divine glory “ in every other instance; and will make us set our “ faces against all open and avowed impieties;
 “ which, methinks, should be considered a little by “ such as would be thought not to be wanting in this “ duty, and yet are often silent under the foulest “ dishonours done to Religion, and its great Author:
 “ for tamely to hear God’s name and worship vilified
 “ by others, is no very good argument that we have “ been used to honour and reverence him, in good “ earnest, ourselves.”

The thought here is well founded, though it is carelessly and loosely brought out. The Sentence, our own praises which we are constantly putting up, will be a spur to us toward procuring and promoting the divine glory in every other instance, is both negligent in language, and ambiguous in meaning; for our own praises, properly signifies the praises of ourselves. Much better if he had said, "Those devout praises which we constantly offer up to the Almighty, will naturally prompt us to promote the divine glory in every other instance."

"4. It will, beyond all this, work in us a deep humility and consciousness of our own imperfections. Upon a frequent attention to God and his attributes, we shall easily discover our own weakness and emptiness; our swelling thoughts of ourselves will abate, and we shall see and feel that we are altogether lighter to be laid in the balance than vanity; and this is a lesson which, to the greatest part of mankind, is, I think, very well worth learning. We are naturally presumptuous and vain; full of ourselves, and regardless of every thing besides, especially when some little outward privileges distinguish us from the rest of mankind; then, 'tis odds, but we look into ourselves with great degrees of complacency, and are wiser (and better every way) in our own conceit, than seven men that can render a reason. Now nothing will contribute so much to the cure of this vanity, as a due attention to God's excellencies and perfections. By comparing these with those which we imagine belong to us, we shall learn, not to think more highly of ourselves than we ought to think of ourselves, but to think soberly; we shall find more satisfaction in looking upwards, and humbling ourselves before our common Creator, than in casting our eyes downwards with scorn upon our fellow-creatures, and setting at nought any part of the work of his hands. The vast distance we are at from real and infinite Worth, will astonish us so “ much, that we shall not be tempted to value our“ selves upon these lesser degrees of pre-eminence, “ which custom or opinion, or some little accidental

 “ advantages, have given us over other men.”

Though the thought here also be just, yet a like deficiency in elegance and beauty appears. The phrase, 'tis odds but we look into ourselves with great degrees of complacency, is much too low and colloquial for a Sermon — he might have said, we are likely, or we are prone to look into ourselves. — Comparing these with those which we imagine belong to us, is also very careless Style. — By comparing these with the virtues and abilities which we ascribe to ourselves, we shall learn — would have been purer and more correct.

“ 5. I shall mention but one use of it more; and “ 'tis this; that a conscientious praise of God will “ keep us back from all false and mean praise, all “ fulsome and servile flatteries, such as are in use “ among men. Praising, as 'tis commonly managed, “ is nothing else but a trial of skill upon a man, how “ many good things we can possibly say of him.
 “ All the treasures of Oratory are ransacked, and all
 “ the fine things that ever were said, are heaped “ together for his sake; and no matter whether it “ belongs to him or not; so there be but enough “ on't. Which is one deplorable instance, among a “ thousand, of the baseness of human nature, of its “ small regard to truth and justice; to right or “ wrong; to what is, or is not to be praised. But “ he who hath a deep sense of the excellencies of “ God upon his heart, will make a God of nothing
 “ besides. He will give every one his just encomium, “ honour where honour is due, and as much as is “ due, because it is his duty to do so ; but the honour “ of God will suffer him to go no further. Which “ rule, if it had been observed, a neighbouring prince “ (which now, God be thanked, needs flattery a great “ deal more than ever he did) would have wanted a “ great deal of that incense which hath been offered “ up to him by his adorers.”

This head appears scarcely to deserve any place among the more important topics that naturally presented themselves on this subject ; at least, it had much better have wanted the application which the Author makes of his reasoning to the flatterers of Louis XIV. ; and the thanks which he offers to God, for the affairs of that prince being in so low a state, that he now needed flattery more than ever. This political Satire is altogether out of place, and unworthy of the subject.

One would be inclined to think, upon reviewing our Author's arguments, that he has overlooked some topics, respecting the happy consequences of this duty, of fully as much importance as any that he has inserted. Particularly, he ought not to have omitted the happy tendency of praise and thanksgiving, to strengthen good dispositions in the heart ; to promote love to God, and imitation of those perfections which we adore ; and to infuse a spirit of ardour and zeal into the whole of religion, as the service of our benefactor. These are consequences which naturally follow from the proper performance of this duty ; and which ought not to have been omitted ; as no opportunity should be lost, of showing the good effect of devotion on practical religion and moral virtue ; and pointing out the necessary connection of the one with the other. For certainly the great end of preaching is, to make men better in all the relations of life, and to promote that complete reformation of heart and conduct, in which true Christianity consists. Our Author, however, upon the whole, is not deficient in such views of religion; for, in his general strain of preaching, as he is extremely pious, so he is, at the same time, practical and moral.

His summing up of the whole argument, in the next paragraph, is elegant and beautiful; and such concluding views of the subject are frequently very proper and useful: "Upon these grounds doth the " duty of praise stand, and these are the obligations
" that bind us to the performance of it. 'Tis the " end of our being, and the very rule and law of our " nature; flowing from the two great fountains of " human action, the understanding, and the will,
" naturally, and almost necessarily. It is the most " excellent part of our religious worship; enduring
" to eternity, after the rest shall be done away; and " paid, even now, in the frankest manner, with the " least regard to our own interest. It recommends " itself to us by several peculiar properties and " advantages; as it carries more pleasure in it, than " all other kinds of devotion; as it enlarges and
" exalts the several powers of the mind; as it breeds
" in us an exquisite sense of God's honour, and a " willingness to promote it in the world; as it " teaches us to be humble and lowly ourselves, and
" yet preserves us from base and sordid flattery,
" from bestowing mean and undue praises upon
" others."

After this, our Author addresses himself to two classes of men, the Careless and the Profane. His address to the Careless is beautiful and pathetic; that to the Profane is not so well executed, and is liable to some objection. Such addresses appear to me to be, on several occasions, very useful parts of a discourse. They prevailed much in the strain of preaching before the Restoration; and, perhaps, since that period, have been too much neglected: They afford an opportunity of bringing home to the consciences of the audience, many things, which, in the course of the Sermon, were, perhaps, delivered in the abstract.

I shall not dwell on the Conclusion of the Sermon, which is chiefly employed in observations on the posture of public affairs at that time: Considered upon the whole, this Discourse of Bishop Atterbury's is both useful and beautiful, though I have ventured to point out some defects in it. Seldom, or never, can we expect to meet with a composition of any kind, which is absolutely perfect in all its parts: and when we take into account the difficulties which I before shewed to attend the Eloquence of the Pulpit, we have, perhaps, less reason to look for perfection in a Sermon, than in any other composition.

LECTURE XXXI.

CONDUCT OF A DISCOURSE IN ALL ITS PARTS — INTRODUCTION — DIVISION — NARRATION AND EXPLICATION.

I HAVE, in the four preceding Lectures, considered what is peculiar to each of the three great fields of Public Speaking, Popular Assemblies, the Bar and the Pulpit. I am now to treat of what is common to them all; of the conduct of a Discourse or Oration, in general. The previous view which I have given of the distinguishing spirit and character of different kinds of Public Speaking, was necessary for the proper application of the rules which I am about to deliver; and as I proceed, I shall farther point out, how far any of these rules may have a particular respect to the Bar, to the Pulpit, or to Popular Courts.

On whatever subject any one intends to discourse, he will most commonly begin with some Introduction, in order to prepare the minds of his hearers; he will then state his subject, and explain the facts connected with it; he will employ arguments for establishing his own opinion, and overthrowing that of his antagonist: he may perhaps, if there be room for it, endeavour to touch the passions of his Audience; and after having said all he thinks proper, he will bring his Discourse to a close, by some Peroration or Conclusion. This being the natural train of Speaking, the parts that compose a regular formal Oration, are these six; first, the Exordium or Introduction; secondly, the State, and the Division of the Subject; thirdly, Narration or Explication; fourthly, the Reasoning or Arguments; fifthly, the Pathetic Part; and lastly, the Conclusion. I do not mean, that each of these must enter into every Public Discourse, or that they must enter always in this order. There is no reason for being so formal on every occasion; nay, it would often be a fault, and would render a Discourse pedantic and stiff. There may be many excellent Discourses in public, where several of these parts are altogether wanting; where the Speaker, for instance, uses no Introduction, but enters directly on his subject; where he has no occasion either to divide or explain; but simply reasons on one side of the question, and then finishes. But as the parts, which I have mentioned, are the natural constituent parts of a regular Oration; and as in every Discourse whatever, some of them must be found, it is necessary to our present purpose, that I should treat of each of them distinctly.

I begin, of course, with the Exordium or Introduction. This is manifestly common to all the three kinds of Public Speaking. It is not a rhetorical invention. It is founded upon nature, and suggested by common sense. When one is going to counsel another; when he takes upon him to instruct, or to reprove, prudence will generally direct him not to do it abruptly, but to use some preparation; to begin with somewhat that may incline the persons, to whom he addresses himself, to judge favourably of what he is about to say; and may dispose them to such a train of thought, as will forward and assist the purpose which he has in view. This is, or ought to be, the main scope of an Introduction. Accordingly Cicero and Quintilian mention three ends, to one or other of which it should be subservient, “Reddere “auditores benevolos, attentos, dociles.”

First, To conciliate the good-will of the hearers; to render them benevolent, or well-affected to the Speaker and to the subject. Topics for this purpose may, in Causes at the Bar, be sometimes taken from the particular situation of the Speaker himself, or of his client, or from the character or behaviour of his antagonists contrasted with his own; on other occasions, from the nature of the subject, as closely connected with the interest of the hearers; and, in general, from the modesty and good intention with which the Speaker enters upon his subject. The second end of an Introduction, is, to raise the attention of the hearers; which may be effected, by giving them some hints of the importance, dignity, or novelty of the subject; or some favourable view of the clearness and precision with which we are to treat it; and of the brevity with which we are to discourse. The third end is to render the hearers docile, or open to persuasion; for which end we must begin with studying to remove any particular prepossessions they may have contracted against the cause, or side of the argument which we espouse.

Some one of these ends should be proposed by every Introduction. When there is no occasion for aiming at any of them; when we are already secure of the good-will, the attention, and the docility of the Audience, as may often be the case, formal Introductions may, without any prejudice, be omitted. And, indeed, when they serve for no purpose but mere ostentation, they had for the most part better be omitted; unless as far as respect to the Audience makes it decent, that a Speaker should not break in upon them too abruptly, but by a short Exordium prepare them for what he is going to say. Demosthenes's Introductions are always short and simple; Cicero's are fuller and more artful.

The ancient Critics distinguish two kinds of Introductions, which they call "Principium," and "Insinuatio." "Principium" is, where the Orator plainly and directly professes his aim in speaking. "Insinuatio" is, where a larger compass must be taken; and where, presuming the disposition of the Audience to be much against the Orator, he must gradually reconcile them to hearing him, before he plainly discovers the point which he has in view.

Of this latter sort of Introduction, we have an admirable instance in Cicero's second Oration against Rullus. This Rullus was tribune of the People, and had proposed an Agrarian Law; the purpose of which was to create a Decemvirate, or ten Commissioners, with absolute power for five years over all the lands conquered by the Republic, in order to divide them among the citizens. Such laws had often been proposed by factious magistrates, and were always greedily received by the people. Cicero is speaking to the people; he had lately been made Consul by their interest; and his first attempt is to make them reject this law. The subject was extremely delicate, and required much art. He begins with acknowledging all the favours which he had received from the people, in preference to the nobility. He professes himself the creature of their power, and of all men the most engaged to promote their interest. He declares, that he held himself to be the Consul of the People; and that he would always glory in preserving the character of a popular magistrate. But to be popular, he observes, is an ambiguous word. He understood it to import, a steady attachment to the real interest of the people, to their liberty, their ease, and their peace; but by some, he saw, it was abused, and made a cover to their own selfish and ambitious designs. In this manner, he begins to draw gradually nearer to his purpose of attacking the proposal of Rullus, but still with great management and reserve. He protests, that he is far from being an enemy to Agrarian Laws; he gives the highest praises to the Gracchi, those zealous patrons of the people; and assures them, that when he first heard of Rullus's Law, he had resolved to support it, if he found it for their interest; but that, upon examining it, he found it calculated to establish a dominion that was inconsistent with liberty, and to aggrandize a few men at the expence of the public; and then terminates his Exordium, with telling them, that he is going to give his reasons for being of this opinion: but that if his reasons shall not satisfy them, he will give up his own opinion, and embrace theirs. In all this, there was great art. His Eloquence produced the intended effect; and the people, with one voice, rejected this Agrarian Law.

Having given these general views of the nature and end of an Introduction, I proceed to lay down some rules for the proper composition of it. These are the more necessary, as this is a part of the Discourse which requires no small care. It is always of importance to begin well ; to make a favourable impression at first setting out ; when the minds of the hearers, vacant as yet and free, are most disposed to receive any impression easily. I must add, too, that a good Introduction is often found to be extremely difficult. Few parts of the Discourse give the Composer more trouble, or are attended with more nicety in the execution.

The first rule is, That the Introduction should be easy and natural. The subject must always suggest it. It must appear, as Cicero beautifully expresses it, “Effloruisse penitus ex re de qua tum agitur.” * It is too common a fault in Introductions, that they are taken from some common-place topic, which has no peculiar relation to the subject in hand ; by which means they stand apart, like pieces detached from the rest of the Discourse. Of this kind are Sallust’s Introductions, prefixed to his Catilinarian and Jugurthine wars. They might as well have been Introductions to any other History, or to any other Treatise whatever ; and, therefore, though elegant in themselves, they must be considered as blemishes in the work, from want of due connection with it. Cicero, though abundantly correct in this particular in his Orations, yet is not so in his other works. It appears from a letter of his to Atticus (L. xvi. 6.), that it was his custom to prepare, at his leisure, a collection of different Introductions or Prefaces, ready to be prefixed to any work that he might afterwards publish. In consequence of this strange method of composing, it happened to him, to employ the same Introduction twice without remembering it; prefixing it to two different works. Upon Atticus informing him of this, he acknowledges the mistake, and sends him a new Introduction.

* “ To have sprung up, of its own accord, from the matter which is under consideration.”

In order to render Introductions natural and easy, it is, in my opinion, a good rule, that they should not be planned, till after one has meditated in his own mind the substance of his Discourse. Then, and not till then, he should begin to think of some proper and natural Introduction. By taking a contrary course, and labouring in the first place on an Introduction, every one who is accustomed to composition will often find, that either he is led to lay hold of some common-place topic, or that, instead of the Introduction being accommodated to the Discourse, he is obliged to accommodate the whole Discourse to the Introduction which he had previously written. Cicero makes this remark; though, as we have seen, his practice was not always conformable to his own rule. “Omnibus rebus consideratis, tum denique id quod primum est dicendum, postremum soleo cogitare, quo utar exordio. Nam si quando id primum invenire volui, nullum mihi occurrit, nisi aut exile, aut nugatorium, aut vulgare.”^{*} After the mind has been once warmed and put in train, by close meditation on the subject, materials for the Preface will then suggest themselves much more readily.

* “When I have planned and digested all the materials of my Discourse, it is my custom to think, in the last place, of the Introduction with which I am to begin. For if at any time I have endeavoured to invent an Introduction first, nothing has ever occurred to me for that purpose, but what was trifling, nugatory, and vulgar.”

In the second place, In an Introduction, correctness should be carefully studied in the expression. This is requisite, on account of the situation of the hearers. They are then more disposed to criticise than at any other period; they are, as yet, unoccupied with the subject or the arguments; their attention is wholly directed to the Speaker's style and manner. Something must be done, therefore, to prepossess them in his favour; though, for the same reasons, too much art must be avoided; for it will be more easily detected at that time than afterwards; and will derogate from persuasion in all that follows. A correct plainness, and elegant simplicity, is the proper character of an Introduction; "ut videamur," says Quintilian, "accuratè non callidè dicere."

In the third place, Modesty is another character which it must carry. All appearances of modesty are favourable, and prepossessing. If the Orator set out with an air of arrogance and ostentation, the self-love and pride of the hearers will be presently awakened, and will follow him with a very suspicious eye throughout all his progress. His modesty should discover itself not only in his expressions at the beginning, but in his whole manner; in his looks, in his gestures, in the tone of his voice. Every auditory take in good part those marks of respect and awe, which are paid to them by one who addresses them. Indeed the modesty of an Introduction should never betray any thing mean or abject. It is always of great use to an Orator, that together with modesty and deference to his hearers, he should shew a certain sense of dignity, arising from a persuasion of the justice or importance of the subject on which he is to speak.

The modesty of an Introduction requires, that it promise not too much. “Non fumum ex fulgore, sed ex fumo dare lucem.”* This certainly is the general rule that an Orator should not put forth all his strength at the beginning, but should rise and grow upon us, as his Discourse advances. There are cases, however, in which it is allowable for him to set out from the first in a high and bold tone; as for instance, when he rises to defend some cause which has been much run down, and decried by the Public. Too modest a beginning might be then like a confession of guilt. By the boldness and strength of his Exordium he must endeavour to stem the tide that is against him, and to remove prejudices, by encountering them without fear. In subjects too of a declamatory nature, and in Sermons, where the subject is striking, a magnificent Introduction has sometimes a good effect, if it be properly supported in the sequel. Thus Bishop Atterbury, in beginning an eloquent Sermon, preached on the 30th of January, the Anniversary of what is called King Charles’s Martyrdom, sets out in this pompous manner: “This is a day of trouble, of rebuke, and of blasphemy; distinguished in the calendar of our Church, and the annals of our nation, by the sufferings of an excellent

* He does not lavish at a blaze his fire,
Sudden to glare, and then in smoke expire;
But rises from a cloud of smoke to light,
And pours his specious miracles to fight.

HOR. ARS POET. FRANCIS.

“ Prince, who fell a sacrifice to the rage of his rebellious subjects ; and by his fall, derived infamy, misery, and guilt on them, and their sinful posterity.” Bossuet, Flechier, and the other celebrated French Preachers, very often begin their Discourses with laboured and sublime Introductions. These raise attention, and throw a lustre on the subject : but let every Speaker be much on his guard against striking a higher note at the beginning, than he is able to keep up in his progress.

In the fourth place, An Introduction should usually be carried on in the calm manner. This is seldom the place for vehemence and passion. Emotions must rise as the Discourse advances. The minds of the Hearers must be gradually prepared, before the Speaker can venture on strong and passionate sentiments. The exceptions to this rule are, when the subject is such, that the very mention of it naturally awakens some passionate emotion ; or when the unexpected presence of some person or object, in a Popular Assembly, inflames the Speaker, and makes him break forth with unusual warmth. Either of these will justify what is called the Exordium ab abrupto. Thus the appearance of Catiline in the Senate renders the vehement beginning of Cicero's first Oration against him very natural and proper : “ Quousque tandem, Catilina, abutere patientia nostra ?” And thus Bishop Atterbury, in preaching from this text, “ Blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me,” ventures on breaking forth with this bold Exordium : “ And can any man then be offended in thee, blessed Jesus ?” which address to our Saviour he continues for a page or two, till he enters on the division of his subject. But such Introductions as these should be hazarded by very few, as they promise so much vehemence and unction through the rest of the Discourse, that it is very difficult to fulfil the expectations of the hearers.

At the same time, though the Introduction is not the place in which warm emotions are usually to be attempted, yet I must take notice, that it ought to prepare the way for such as are designed to be raised in subsequent parts of the Discourse. The Orator should, in the beginning, turn the minds of his hearers towards those sentiments and feelings which he seeks to awaken in the course of his Speech. According, for instance, as it is compassion, or indignation, or contempt, on which his Discourse is to rest, he ought to sow the seeds of these in his Introduction; he ought to begin with breathing that spirit which he means to inspire. Much of the Orator's art and ability is shewn, in thus striking properly at the commencement, the key-note, if we may so express it, of the rest of his Oration.

In the fifth place, It is a rule in Introductions, not to anticipate any material part of the subject. When topics, or arguments, which are afterwards to be enlarged upon, are hinted at, and, in part, brought forth in the Introduction, they lose the grace of novelty upon their second appearance. The impression intended to be made by any capital thought, is always made with the greatest advantage, when it is made entire, and in its proper place.

In the last place, the Introduction ought to be proportioned, both in length, and in kind, to the Discourse that is to follow: in length, as nothing can be more absurd than to erect a very great portico before a small building; and in kind, as it is no less absurd to overcharge, with superb ornaments, the portico of a plain dwelling-house, or to make the entrance to a monument as gay as that to an harbour. Common sense directs, that every part of a Discourse should be suited to the strain and spirit of the whole.

These are the principal rules that relate to Introductions. They are adapted, in a great measure, equally, to discourses of all kinds. In Pleadings at the Bar, or Speeches in Public Assemblies, particular care must be taken not to employ any Introduction of that kind, which the adverse party may lay hold of, and turn to his advantage. To this inconvenience all those introductions are exposed, which are taken from general and common-place topics; and it never fails to give an adversary a considerable triumph, if, by giving a small turn to something we had said in our Exordium, he can appear to convert to his own favour, the principles with which we had set out, in beginning our attack upon him. In the case of Replies, Quintilian makes an observation which is very worthy of notice; that Introductions, drawn from something that has been said in the course of the Debate, have always a peculiar grace; and the reason he gives for it is just and sensible: “Mul-
“tum gratiæ exordio est, quod ab actione diversæ “partis materiam trahit; hoc ipso, quod non com- “positum domi, sed ibi atque e re natum; et faci- “litate famam ingenii auget; et facie simplicis, “sumptique e proximo sermonis, fidem quoque
“acquirit; adeo, ut etiamsi reliqua scripta atque

“elaborata sint, tamen videatur tota extemporalis “oratio, cujus initium nihil preparatum habuisse, “manifestum est.”*

In Sermons, such a practice as this cannot take place; and, indeed, in composing Sermons, few things are more difficult than to remove an appearance of stiffness from an Introduction, when a formal one is used. The French Preachers, as I before observed, are often very splendid and lively in their Introductions; but, among us, attempts of this kind are not always so successful. When long Introductions are formed upon some common-place topic, as the desire of happiness being natural to man, or the like, they never fail of being tedious. Variety should be studied in this part of composition as much as possible; often it may be proper to begin without any Introduction at all, unless, perhaps, one or two sentences. Explanatory Introductions from the context, are the most simple of any, and frequently the best that can be used: but as they are in hazard of becoming dry, they should never be long. A Historical Introduction, has, generally, a happy effect to rouse attention; when one can lay hold upon some noted fact that is connected with the Text or the

* “An Introduction, which is founded upon the pleading of “the opposite party, is extremely graceful; for this reason, that “it appears not to have been meditated at home, but to have “taken rise from the business, and to have been composed on the “spot. Hence, it gives to the Speaker the reputation of a quick “invention, and adds weight likewise to his Discourse, as artless
“and unlaboured; insomuch, that though all the rest of his Oration “should be studied and written, yet the whole Discourse has the “appearance of being extemporary, as it is evident that the Intro“duction to it was unpremeditated.”

Discourse, and, by a proper illustration of it, open the way to the subject that is to be treated of.

After the Introduction, what commonly comes next in order, is the Proposition, or Enunciation of the Subject; concerning which there is nothing to be said, but that it should be as clear and distinct as possible, and expressed in few and plain words, without the least affectation. To this generally succeeds the Division, or the laying down the method of the Discourse; on which it is necessary to make some observations. I do not mean, that in every Discourse, a formal Division or Distribution of it into parts, is requisite. There are many occasions of Public Speaking when this is neither requisite nor would be proper; when the Discourse perhaps, is to be short, or only one point is to be treated of; or when the Speaker does not chuse to warn his hearers of the method he is to follow, or of the conclusion to which he seeks to bring them. Order of one kind or other is, indeed, essential to every good Discourse; that is, every thing should be so arranged, as that what goes before may give light and force to what follows. But this may be accomplished by means of a concealed method. What we call Division is, when the method is propounded in form to the hearers.

The Discourse in which this sort of Division most commonly takes place, is a Sermon; and a question has been moved, whether this method of laying down heads, as it is called, be the best method of preaching. A very able judge, the Archbishop of Cambray, in his Dialogues on Eloquence, declares strongly against it. He observes, that it is a modern invention; that it was never practised by the Fathers of the Church; and, what is certainly true, that it took its rise from the schoolmen, when Metaphysics began to be introduced into preaching. He is of opinion, that it renders a Sermon stiff; that it breaks the unity of the Discourse; and that, by the natural connection of one part with another, the attention of the hearers would be carried along the whole with more advantage.

But, notwithstanding his authority and his arguments, I cannot help being of opinion, that the present method of dividing a Sermon into heads, ought not to be laid aside. Established practice has now given it so much weight, that, were there nothing more in its favour, it would be dangerous for any Preacher to deviate so far from the common track. But the practice itself has also, in my judgment, much reason on its side. If formal partitions give a Sermon less of the oratorical appearance, they render it, however, more clear, more easily apprehended, and, of course, more instructive to the bulk of hearers, which is always the main object to be kept in view. The heads of a Sermon are great assistances to the memory and recollection of a hearer. They serve also to fix his attention. They enable him more easily to keep pace with the progress of the Discourse; they give him pauses and resting-places, where he can reflect on what has been said, and look forward to what is to follow. They are attended with this advantage too, that they give the audience the opportunity of knowing, before-hand, when they are to be released from the fatigue of attention, and thereby make them follow the Speaker more patiently: "Reficit audientem," says Quinctilian, taking notice of this very advantage of Divisions in other Discourses, "Reficit audientem certo singularum par-“ tium fine ; non aliter quàm facientibus iter, mul“ tum detrahunt fatigationis notata spatia in scriptis “ lapidibus : nam et exhausti laboris nôsse mensuram “ voluptati est ; et hortatur ad reliqua fortius exe“ quenda, scire quantum supersit.” * With regard to breaking the Unity of a Discourse, I cannot be of opinion that there arises, from that quarter, any argument against the method I am defending. If the Unity be broken it is to the nature of the heads, or topics of which the Speaker treats, that this is to be imputed ; not to his laying them down in form. On the contrary, if his heads be well chosen, his marking them out, and distinguishing them, in place of impairing the Unity of the whole, renders it more conspicuous and complete ; by shewing how all the parts of a Discourse hang upon one another, and tend to one point.

In a Sermon, or in a Pleading, or any Discourse, where Division is proper to be used, the most material rules are,

First, That the several parts into which the subject is divided, be really distinct from one another ; that is, that no one include another. It were a very absurd Division, for instance, if one should propose to treat first, of the advantages of Virtue, and next, of those of Justice or Temperance ; because, the first head evidently comprehends the second, as a Genus

* “ The conclusion of each head is a relief to the hearers ; just “ as, upon a journey, the mile-stones, which are set upon the “ road, serve to diminish the traveller’s fatigue. For we are “ always pleased with seeing our labour begin to lessen ; and, by “ calculating how much remains, are stirred up to finish our task “ more cheerfully.”

does the Species; which method of proceeding involves the subject in indistinctness and disorder.

Secondly, In Division, we must take care to follow the order of nature; beginning with the simplest points, such as are easiest apprehended, and necessary to be first discussed; and proceeding thence to those which are built upon the former, and which suppose them to be known. We must divide the subject into those parts into which most easily and naturally it is resolved; that it may seem to split itself, and not to be violently torn asunder: "Dividere," as is commonly said, "non frangere."

Thirdly, The several members of a Division ought to exhaust the subject; otherwise we do not make a complete division; we exhibit the subject by pieces and corners only, without giving any such plan as displays the whole.

Fourthly, The terms in which our partitions are expressed, should be as concise as possible. Avoid all circumlocution here. Admit not a single word but what is necessary. Precision is to be studied, above all things, in laying down a method. It is this which chiefly makes a Division appear neat and elegant; when the several heads are propounded in the clearest, most expressive, and, at the same time, the fewest words possible. This never fails to strike the hearers agreeably; and is, at the same time, of great consequence towards making the Divisions be more easily remembered.

Fifthly, Avoid an unnecessary multiplication of heads. To split a subject into a great many minute parts, by Divisions and Subdivisions without end, has always a bad effect in speaking. It may be proper in a logical treatise; but it makes an Oration appear hard and dry, and unnecessarily fatigues the memory. In a Sermon, there may be from three to five or six heads, including Subdivisions; seldom should there be more.

In a Sermon, or in a Pleading at the Bar, few things are of greater consequence, than a proper or happy Division. It should be studied with much accuracy and care; for if one take a wrong method at first setting out, it will lead them astray in all that follows. It will render the whole Discourse either perplexed or languid; and though the hearers may not be able to tell where the fault or disorder lies, they will be sensible there is a disorder somewhere, and find themselves little affected by what is spoken. The French writers of Sermons study neatness and elegance in the Division of their subjects much more than the English do; whose distributions, though sensible and just, yet are often inartificial and verbose. Among the French, however, too much quaintness appears in their Divisions, with an affectation of always setting out either with two, or with three, general heads of Discourse. A Division of Massillon's on this text, "It is finished," has been much extolled by the French Critics: "This imports," says the Preacher, "consummation, first, of justice on the part of God; secondly, of wickedness on the part of men; thirdly, of love on the part of Christ." This also of Bourdaloue's has been much praised, from these words, "My peace I give unto you:" "Peace," says he, "first, to the understanding, by submission to faith; secondly, to the heart, by submission to the law."

The next constituent part of a Discourse, which I mentioned, was Narration or Explication. I put these two together, both because they fall nearly under the same rules, and because they commonly answer the same purpose; serving to illustrate the cause, or the subject of which the Orator treats, before he proceeds to argue either on one side or other; or to make any attempt for interesting the passions of the hearers.

In Pleadings at the Bar, Narration is often a very important part of the Discourse, and requires to be particularly attended to. Besides its being in any case no easy matter to relate with grace and propriety, there is, in Narrations at the Bar, a peculiar difficulty. The Pleader must say nothing but what is true; and, at the same time, he must avoid saying any thing that will hurt his cause. The facts which he relates, are to be the ground-work of all his future reasoning. To recount them so as to keep strictly within the bounds of truth, and yet to present them under the colours most favourable to his cause; to place, in the most striking light, every circumstance which is to his advantage, and to soften and weaken such as make against him, demand no small exertion of skill and dexterity. He must always remember, that if he discovers too much art, he defeats his own purpose, and creates a distrust of his sincerity. Quintilian very properly directs, “Effugienda in hac præcipuè parte, omnis calliditatis suspicio; neque enim se usquam magis custodit iudex, quàm cum narrat orator; nihil tum videatur fictum; nihil sollicitum; omnia potius a causa, quam ab oratore, profecta videantur.” *

* “In this part of Discourse, the Speaker must be very careful to shun every appearance of art and cunning. For there is no

To be clear and distinct, to be probable, and to be concise, are the qualities which Critics chiefly require in Narration; each of which carries, sufficiently, the evidence of its importance. Distinctness belongs to the whole train of the Discourse, but is especially requisite in Narration, which ought to throw light on all that follows. A fact, or a single circumstance left in obscurity, and misapprehended by the Judge, may destroy the effect of all the argument and reasoning which the Speaker employs. If his Narration be improbable, the Judge will not regard it; and if it be tedious and diffuse, he will be tired of it, and forget it. In order to produce distinctness, besides the study of the general rules of perspicuity which were formerly given, Narration requires particular attention to ascertain clearly the names, the dates, the places, and every other material circumstance of the facts recounted. In order to be probable in Narration, it is material to enter into the characters of the persons of whom we speak, and to shew, that their actions proceeded from such motives as are natural, and likely to gain belief. In order to be as concise as the subject will admit, it is necessary to throw out all superfluous circumstances; the rejection of which will likewise tend to make our Narration more forcible and more clear.

Cicero is very remarkable for his talent of Narration; and from the examples in his Orations much “time at which the Judge is more upon his guard, than when the Pleader is relating facts. Let nothing then seem feigned; nothing anxiously concealed. Let all that is said, appear to arise from the cause itself, and not to be the work of the Orator.”

may be learned. The Narration, for instance, in the celebrated Oration pro Milone, has been often and justly admired. His scope is to shew, that though in fact Clodius was killed by Milo, or his servants, yet that it was only in self-defence; and that the design had been laid, not by Milo against Clodius, but by Clodius against Milo's life. All the circumstances for rendering this probable are painted with wonderful art. In relating the manner of Milo's setting out from Rome, he gives the most natural description of a family excursion to the country, under which it was impossible that any bloody design could be concealed. "He remained," says he, "in the Senate-house that day, till all the business was over. He came home, changed his clothes deliberately, and waited for some time, till his wife had got all her things ready for going with him in his carriage to the country. He did not set out till such time as Clodius might easily have been in Rome, if he had not been lying in wait for Milo by the way. By and by, Clodius met him on the road, on horseback, like a man prepared for action, no carriage, nor his wife, as was usual, nor any family equipage along with him; whilst Milo, who is supposed to be meditating slaughter and assassination, is travelling in a carriage with his wife, wrapped up in his cloak, embarrassed with baggage, and attended by a great train of women servants, and boys." He goes on, describing the rencounter that followed; Clodius's servants attacking those of Milo, and killing the driver of his carriage; Milo jumping out, throwing off his cloak, and making the best defence he could, while Clodius's servants endeavoured to surround him; and then concludes his Narration with a very delicate and happy stroke: He does not say in plain words, that Milo's servants killed Clodius, but that "in the midst of the tumult, Milo's servants, without the orders, without the knowledge, without the presence of their master, did what every master would have wished his servants, in a like conjuncture, to have done." *

In Sermons, where there is seldom any occasion for Narration, Explication of the subject to be discoursed on, comes in the place of Narration at the Bar, and is to be taken up much on the same tone; that is, it must be concise, clear, and distinct; and in a Style correct and elegant, rather than highly adorned. To explain the doctrine of the text with propriety; to give a full and perspicuous account of the nature of that virtue or duty which forms the subject of the Discourse, is properly the didactic part of Preaching; on the right execution of which much depends for all that comes afterwards in the way of persuasion. The great art in succeeding in it, is, to meditate profoundly on the subject, so as to be able to place it in a clear and strong point of view. Consider what light other passages of Scripture throw upon it; consider whether it be a subject nearly related to some other from which it is proper to distinguish it: consider whether it can be illustrated to advantage by comparing it with, or opposing it to, some other thing; by inquiring into causes, or tracing effects; by pointing out examples, or appealing to the feelings of the hearers; that thus, a definite, precise, circumstantial view may be afforded of the doctrine to be inculcated. Let the Preacher be persuaded, that, by such distinct and apt illustrations of the known truths of religion, it may both display great merit in the way of composition, and, what he ought to consider as far more valuable, render his Discourses weighty, instructive, and useful.

* "Milo, cùm in Senatu fuisset eo die; quoad Senatus dimissus est, domum venit. Calceos et vestimenta mutavit; paulisper, dùm se uxor (ut fit) comparat, commoratus est; deinde profectus est, id temporis cùm jam Clodius, si quidem eo die Romam venturus erat, redire potuisset. Obviam fit ei Clodius expeditus, in equo, nulla rheda, nullis impedimentis, nullis Græcis comitibus, ut solebat; sine uxore, quod nunquam fere. Cum hic insidiator, qui iter illud ad cædem faciendam apparasset, cum uxore veheretur in rheda, penulatus, vulgi magno impedimento, ac muliebri et delicato ancillarum puerorumque comitatu. Fit obviam Clodio ante fundum ejus, hora fere undecima, aut non multo secus. Statim complures cum telis in hunc faciunt de loco superiore impetum: adversi rhedarium occidunt; cùm autem hic de rheda, rejecta penula desilisset, seque acri animo defenderet, illi qui erant cum Clodio, gladiis eductis, partim recurrere ad rhedam, ut a tergo Milonem adorerentur; partim, quod hunc jam interfectum putarent, cædere incipiunt ejus servos qui post erant; ex quibus qui animo fideli in dominum et præsentem fuerunt, partim occisi sunt; partim cum ad rhedam pugnare viderunt, et domino succurrere prohiberentur, Milonemque occisum etiam ex ipso Clodio audirent, et ita esse putarent, fecerunt id servi Milonis (dicam enim non derivandi criminis causâ, sed ut factum est) neque imperante, neque sciente, neque præsentem domino, quod suos quisque servos in tali re facere voluisset."

LECTURE XXXII.

CONDUCT OF A DISCOURSE—THE ARGUMENTATIVE
PART—THE PATHETIC PART—THE PERORATION.

IN treating of the constituent parts of a regular Discourse or Oration, I have already considered the Introduction, the Division, and the Narration or Explication. I proceed next to treat of the argumentative or reasoning Part of a Discourse. In whatever place, or on whatever subject one speaks, this, beyond doubt, is of the greatest consequence. For the great end for which men speak on any serious occasion, is to convince their hearers of something being either true, or right, or good; and, by means of this conviction, to influence their practice. Reason and Argument make the foundation, as I have often inculcated, of all manly and persuasive Eloquence.

Now, with respect to Arguments, three things are requisite. First, the invention of them; secondly, the proper disposition and arrangement of them; and thirdly, the expressing of them in such a style and manner, as to give them their full force.

The first of these, Invention, is, without doubt, the most material, and the ground-work of the rest. But, with respect to this, I am afraid it is beyond the power of art to give any real assistance. Art cannot go so far, as to supply a Speaker with Arguments on every cause, and every subject; though it may be of considerable use in assisting him to arrange and express those, which his knowledge of the subject has discovered. For it is one thing to discover the reasons that are most proper to convince men, and another, to manage these reasons with the most advantage. The latter is all that Rhetoric can pretend to.

The ancient Rhetoricians did indeed attempt to go much farther than this. They attempted to form Rhetoric into a more complete System; and professed not only to assist Public Speakers in setting off their Arguments to most advantage; but to supply the defect of their invention, and to teach them where to find Arguments on every subject and cause. Hence their doctrine of Topics, or "Loci Communes," and "Sedes Argumentorum," which makes so great a figure in the writings of Aristotle, Cicero, and Quinctilian. These Topics, or Loci, were no other than general ideas applicable to a great many different subjects, which the Orator was directed to consult, in order to find out materials for his Speech. They had their intrinsic and extrinsic Loci; some Loci, that were common to all the different kinds of Public Speaking, and some that were peculiar to each. The common or general Loci, were such as Genus and Species, Cause and Effect, Antecedents and Consequents, Likeness and Contrariety, Definition, Circumstances of Time and Place; and a great many more of the same kinds. For each of the different kinds of Public Speaking, they had their "Loci Personarum," and "Loci Rerum:" As in Demonstrative Orations, for instance, the heads from which any one could be decried or praised; his birth, his country, his education, his kindred, the qualities of his body, the qualities of his mind, the fortune he enjoyed, the stations he had filled, &c.; and in Deliberative Orations, the Topics that might be used in recommending any public measure, or dissuading from it; such as, honesty, justice, facility, profit, pleasure, glory, assistance from friends, mortification to enemies, and the like.

The Grecian Sophists were the first inventors of this artificial system of Oratory; and they shewed a prodigious subtilty and fertility in the contrivance of these Loci. Succeeding Rhetoricians, dazzled by the plan, wrought them up into so regular a system, that one would think they meant to teach how a person might mechanically become an Orator, without any genius at all. They gave him receipts for making Speeches, on all manner of subjects. At the same time, it is evident that though this study of common places might produce very showy academical declamations, it could never produce useful discourses on real business. The Loci indeed supplied a most exuberant fecundity of matter. One who had no other aim but to talk copiously and plausibly, by consulting them on every subject, and laying hold of all that they suggested, might discourse without end; and that too, though he had none but the most superficial knowledge of his subject. But such discourse could be no other than trivial. What is truly solid and persuasive, must be drawn "ex visceribus causæ," from a thorough knowledge of the subject, and profound meditation on it. They who would direct students of Oratory to any other sources of Argumentation, only delude them; and by attempting to render Rhetoric too perfect an art, they render it, in truth, a trifling and childish study.

On this doctrine, therefore, of the Rhetorical Loci, or Topics, I think it superfluous to insist. If any think that the knowledge of them may contribute to improve their invention, and extend their views, they must consult Aristotle and Quintilian, or what Cicero has written on this head, in his Treatise De Inventione, his Topica, and Second Book De Oratore. But when they are to prepare a Discourse, by which they propose to convince a Judge, or to produce any considerable effect upon an Assembly, I would advise them to lay aside their common places, and to think closely of their subject. Demosthenes, I dare say, consulted none of the Loci, when he was inciting the Athenians to take arms against Philip; and where Cicero has had recourse to them, his Orations are so much the worse on that account.

I proceed to what is of more real use, to point out the assistance that can be given, not with respect to the invention, but with respect to the disposition and conduct of Arguments.

Two different methods may be used by Orators in the conduct of their reasoning; the terms of art for which are, the Analytic, and the Synthetic method. The Analytic is, when the Orator conceals his intention concerning the point he is to prove, till he has gradually brought his hearers to the designed conclusion. They are led on, step by step, from one known truth to another, till the conclusion be stolen upon them, as the natural consequence of a chain of propositions. As for instance, when one intending to prove the being of a God, sets out with observing that every thing which we see in the world has had a beginning; that whatever has had a beginning, must have had a prior cause; that in human productions, art shewn in the effect, necessarily infers design in the cause: and proceeds leading you on from one cause to another, till you arrive at one supreme first cause, from whom is derived all the order and design visible in his works. This is much the same with the Socratic method, by which that philosopher silenced the Sophists of his age. It is a very artful method of reasoning; may be carried on with much beauty, and is proper to be used when the hearers are much prejudiced against any truth, and by imperceptible steps must be led to conviction.

But there are few subjects that will admit this method, and not many occasions on which it is proper to be employed. The mode of reasoning most generally used, and most suited to the train of Popular Speaking, is what is called the Synthetic; when the point to be proved is fairly laid down, and one Argument after another is made to bear upon it, till the hearers be fully convinced.

Now, in all arguing, one of the first things to be attended to is, among the various Arguments which may occur upon a cause, to make a proper selection of such as appear to one's self the most solid; and to employ these as the chief means of persuasion. Every Speaker should place himself in the situation of a hearer, and think how he would be affected by those reasons, which he purposes to employ for persuading others. For he must not expect to impose on mankind by mere arts of Speech. They are not so easily imposed on, as Public Speakers are sometimes apt to think. Shrewdness and sagacity are found among all ranks ; and the Speaker may be praised for his fine Discourse, while yet the hearers are not persuaded of the truth of any one thing he has uttered.

Supposing the Arguments properly chosen, it is evident that their effect will, in some measure, depend on the right arrangement of them ; so as they shall not jumble and embarrass one another, but give mutual aid ; and bear with the fairest and fullest direction on the point in view. Concerning this, the following rules may be taken :

In the first place, Avoid blending Arguments confusedly together, that are of a separate nature. All Arguments whatever are directed to prove one or other of these three things ; that something is true ; that it is morally right or fit ; or that it is profitable and good. These make the three great subjects of discussion among mankind ; Truth, Duty, and Interest. But the Arguments directed towards any one of them are generically distinct ; and he who blends them all under one Topic, which he calls his argument, as, in Sermons especially, is too often done, will render his reasoning indistinct and inelegant. Suppose, for instance, that I am recommending to an Audience Benevolence, or the Love of our Neighbour ; and that I take my first Argument from the inward satisfaction which a benevolent temper affords ; my second, from the obligation which the example of Christ lays upon us to this duty ; and my third, from its tendency to procure us the good-will of all around us ; my Arguments are good, but I have arranged them wrong : for my first and third Arguments are taken from considerations of interest, internal peace, and external advantages ; and between these, I have introduced one, which rests wholly upon duty. I should have kept those classes of Arguments, which are addressed to different principles in human nature, separate and distinct.

In the second place, With regard to the different degrees of strength in Arguments, the general rule is, to advance in the way of climax, “ut augeatur semper, et increseat oratio.” This especially is to be the course, when the Speaker has a clear cause, and is confident that he can prove it fully. He may then adventure to begin with feebler Arguments; rising gradually, and not putting forth his whole strength till the last, when he can trust to his making a successful impression on the minds of hearers, prepared by what has gone before. But this rule is not to be always followed. For, if he distrusts his cause, and has but one material Argument on which to lay the stress, putting less confidence in the rest, in this case, it is often proper for him to place this material Argument in the front; to pre-occupy the hearers early, and make the strongest effort at first: that, having removed prejudices, and disposed them to be favourable, the rest of his reasoning may be listened to with more candour. When it happens, that amidst a variety of Arguments, there are one or two which we are sensible are more inconclusive than the rest, and yet proper to be used, Cicero advises to place these in the middle, as a station less conspicuous than either the beginning, or the end, of the train of reasoning.

In the third place, When our Arguments are strong and satisfactory, the more they are distinguished and treated apart from each other, the better. Each can then bear to be brought out by itself, placed in its full light, amplified and rested upon. But when our Arguments are doubtful, and only of the presumptive kind, it is safer to throw them together in a crowd, and to run them into one another: “ut quæ sunt natura imbecilla,” as Quinctilian speaks, “mutuo auxilio sustineantur;” that though infirm of themselves, they may serve mutually to prop each other. He gives a good example; in the case of one who was accused of murdering a relation, to whom he was heir. Direct proof was wanting; but, “you expected a succession, and a great succession; you were in distress circumstances; you were pushed to the utmost by your creditors; you had offended your relation, who had made you his heir; you knew that he was just then intending to alter his will; no time was to be lost. Each of these particulars, by itself,” says the Author, “is inconclusive; but when they are assembled in one group, they have effect.”

Of the distinct amplification of one persuasive Argument, we have a most beautiful example in Cicero's Oration for Milo. The Argument is taken from a circumstance of time. Milo was candidate for the Consulship; and Clodius was killed a few days before the election. He asks, if any one could believe that Milo would be mad enough, at such a critical time, by a most odious assassination, to alienate from himself the favour of people, whose suffrages he was so anxiously courting? This Argument, the moment it is suggested, appears to have considerable weight. But it was not enough, simply to suggest it; it could bear to be dwelt upon, and brought out into full light. The Orator, therefore, draws a just and striking picture of that solicitous attention with which candidates, at such a season, always found it necessary to cultivate the good opinion of the people. "Quo tempore," says he, "(Scio enim quam timida sit ambitio, quantaque et quam sollicita, cupiditas consulatûs) omnia, non modo quæ reprehendi palam, sed etiam quæ obscure cogitari possunt, timemus. Rumorem, fabulam fictam et falsam, perhorrescimus; ora omnium atque oculos intuemur. Nihil enim est tam tenebrum, tam aut fragile aut flexibile, quam voluntas erga nos sensusque civium, qui non modo improbitati irascuntur candidatorum, sed etiam in recte factis sæpe fastidiunt." From all which he most justly concludes, "Hunc diem igitur Campi, spectatum atque exoptatum, sibi proponens Milo, cruentis manibus, scelus atque facinus præ se ferens, ad illa centuriarum auspicia veniebat? Quam hoc in illo minimum credibile?"* But though such amplification as this be extremely beautiful, I must add a caution,

* "Well do I know to what length the timidity goes of such as are candidates for public offices, and how many anxious cares and attentions, a canvass for the Consulship necessarily carries along with it. On such an occasion, we are afraid not only of what we may openly be reproached with, but of what others may think of us in secret. The slightest rumour, the most improbable tale that can be devised to our prejudice, alarms and disconcerts us. We study the countenance, and the looks of all around us. For nothing is so delicate, so frail and uncertain, as the public favour. Our fellow-citizens not only are justly offended with the vices of candidates, but even, on occasion of meritorious actions, are apt to conceive capricious disgusts. Is there then the least credibility that Milo, after having so long fixed his attention on the important and wished-for day of election, would dare to have any thoughts of presenting himself before the august Assembly of the People, as a murderer and assassin, with his hands embued in blood?"

In the fourth place, against extending Arguments too far, and multiplying them too much. This serves rather to render a cause suspected, than to give it weight. An unnecessary multiplicity of Arguments both burdens the memory, and detracts from the weight of that conviction which a few well-chosen Arguments carry. It is to be observed too, that in the Amplification of Arguments, a diffuse and spreading method, beyond the bounds of reasonable illustration, is always enfeebling. It takes off greatly from that "vis et acumen," which should be the distinguishing character of the Argumentative Part of a Discourse. When a Speaker dwells long on a favourite Argument, and seeks to turn it into every possible light, it almost always happens, that, fatigued with the effort, he loses the spirit with which he set out, and concludes with feebleness what he began with force. There is a proper temperance in reasoning as there is in other parts of a Discourse.

After due attention given to the proper arrangement of Arguments, what is next requisite for their success, is to express them in such a Style, and to deliver them in such a manner, as shall give them full force. On these heads I must refer the Reader to the directions I have given in treating of Style, in former Lectures; and to the directions I am afterwards to give concerning Pronunciation and Delivery.

I proceed, therefore, next to another essential part of Discourse which I mentioned as the fifth in order, that is, the Pathetic; in which, if any where, Eloquence reigns, and exerts its power. I shall not, in beginning this head, take up time in combating the scruples of those who have moved a question, whether it be consistent with fairness and candour in a Public Speaker, to address the passions of his Audience? This is a question about words alone, and which common sense easily determines. In inquiries after mere truth, in matters of simple information and instruction, there is no question that the passions have no concern, and that all attempts to move them are absurd. Wherever conviction is the object, it is the understanding alone that is to be applied to. It is by argument and reasoning, that one man attempts to satisfy another of what is true, or right, or just; but if persuasion be the object, the case is changed. In all that relates to practice, there is no man who seriously means to persuade another, but addresses himself to his passions more or less; for this plain reason, that passions are the great springs of human action. The most virtuous man, in treating of the most virtuous subject, seeks to touch the heart of him to whom he speaks; and makes no scruple to raise his indignation at injustice, or his pity to the distressed, though pity and indignation be passions.

In treating of this part of Eloquence, the ancients made the same sort of attempt as they employed with respect to the argumentative part, in order to bring Rhetoric into a more perfect system. They inquired metaphysically into the nature of every passion; they gave a definition and a description of it; they treated of its causes, its effects, and its concomitants; and thence deduced rules for working upon it. Aristotle in particular has, in his Treatise upon Rhetoric, discussed the nature of the passions with much profoundness and subtilty; and what he has written on that head, may be read with no small profit, as a valuable piece of Moral Philosophy; but whether it will have any effect in rendering an Orator more pathetic, is to me doubtful. It is not, I am afraid, any philosophical knowledge of the passions, that can confer this talent. We must be indebted for it to Nature, a certain strong and happy sensibility of mind; and one may be a most thorough adept in all the speculative knowledge that can be acquired concerning the passions, and remain at the same time a cold and dry Speaker. The use of rules and instructions on this or any other part of Oratory, is not to supply the want of genius, but to direct it where it is found, into its proper channel; to assist it in exerting itself with most advantage, and to prevent the errors and extravagancies into which it is sometimes apt to run. On the head of the Pathetic, the following directions appear to me to be useful.

The first is to consider carefully, whether the subject admit the Pathetic, and render it proper; and if it does, what part of the Discourse is the most proper for attempting it. To determine these points belongs to good sense; for it is evident, that there are many subjects which admit not the Pathetic at all, and that even in those that are susceptible of it, an attempt to excite the passions in the wrong place, may expose an Orator to ridicule. All that can be said in general is, that if we expect any emotion which we raise to have a lasting effect, we must be careful to bring over to our side, in the first place, the understanding and judgment. The hearers must be convinced that there are good and sufficient grounds for their entering with warmth into the cause. They must be able to justify to themselves the passion which they feel; and remain satisfied that they are not carried away by mere delusion. Unless their minds be brought into this state, although they may have been heated by the Orator's discourse, yet, as soon as he ceases to speak, they will resume their ordinary tone of thought; and the emotion which he has raised will die entirely away. Hence most writers assign the Pathetic to the Peroration or Conclusion, as its natural place; and, no doubt, all other things being equal, this is the impression that one would chuse to make last, leaving the minds of the hearers warmed with the subject, after argument and reasoning had produced their full effect: but wherever it is introduced, I must advise,

In the second place, never to set apart a head of a discourse in form, for raising any passion; never give warning that you are about to be pathetic; and call upon your hearers, as is sometimes done, to follow you in the attempt. This almost never fails to prove a refrigerant to passion. It puts the hearers immediately on their guard, and disposes them for criticising, much more than for being moved. The indirect method of making an impression is likely to be more successful, when you seize the critical moment that is favourable to emotion, in whatever part of the discourse it occurs, and then, after due preparation, throw in such circumstances, and present such glowing images, as may kindle their passions before they are aware. This can often be done more happily, in a few sentences inspired by natural warmth, than in a long and studied Address.

In the third place, It is necessary to observe, that there is a great difference between shewing the hearers that they ought to be moved, and actually moving them. This distinction is not sufficiently attended to, especially by Preachers, who, if they have a head in their Sermon to shew how much we are bound to be grateful to God, or to be compassionate to the distrest, are apt to imagine this to be a pathetic part. Now, all the Arguments you produce to shew me, why it is my duty, why it is reasonable and fit, that I should be moved in a certain way, go no farther than to dispose or prepare me for entering into such an emotion; but they do not actually excite it. To every emotion or passion, Nature has adapted a set of corresponding objects; and, without setting these before the mind, it is not in the power of any Orator to raise that emotion. I am warmed with gratitude, I am touched with compassion, not when a Speaker shews me that these are noble dispositions, and that it is my duty to feel them; or when he exclaims against me for my indifference and coldness. All this time, he is speaking only to my reason or conscience. He must describe the kindness and tenderness of my friend; he must set before me the distress suffered by the person for whom he would interest me; then, and not till then, my heart begins to be touched, my gratitude or my compassion begins to flow. The foundation, therefore, of all successive execution in the way of Pathetic Oratory is, to paint the object of that passion which we wish to raise, in the most natural and striking manner; to describe it with such circumstances as are likely to awaken it in the minds of others. Every passion is most strongly excited by sensation; as anger by the feeling of an injury, or the presence of the injurer. Next to the influence of Sense, is that of Memory; and next to Memory, is the influence of the Imagination. Of this power, therefore, the Orator must avail himself, so as to strike the imagination of the hearers with circumstances which, in lustre and steadiness, resemble those of Sensation and Remembrance. In order to accomplish this,

In the fourth place, the only effectual method is, to be moved yourselves. There are a thousand interesting circumstances suggested by real passion, which no art can imitate, and no refinement can supply. There is obviously a contagion among the passions.

Ut ridentibus arident, sic flentibus adflent, Humani vultus.

The internal emotion of the Speaker adds a pathos to his words, his looks, his gestures, and his whole manner, which exerts a power almost irresistible over those who hear him.* But on this point, though the most material of all, I shall not now insist, as I have often had occasion before to shew, that all attempts towards becoming Pathetic, when we are not moved ourselves, expose us to certain ridicule.

Quinctilian, who discourses upon this subject with much good sense, takes pains to inform us of the method which he used, when he was a Public Speaker, for entering into those passions which he wanted to excite in others: setting before his own imagination what he calls “Phantasiæ,” or “Visiones,” strong pictures of the distress or indignities which they had suffered, whose cause he was to plead, and for whom he was to interest his hearers; dwelling upon these, and putting himself in their situation, till he was affected by a passion, similar to that which the persons themselves had felt.* To this method he attributes all the success he ever had in Public Speaking; and there can be no doubt that whatever tends to increase an Orator’s sensibility, will add greatly to his Pathetic Powers.

* " Quid enim aliud est causæ ut lugentes, in recenti dolore, disertissime quædam exclamare videantur; et ira nonnunquam in indoctis quoque eloquentiam faciat; quàm quod illis inest vis mentis, et veritas ipsa Morum? quare in iis quæ verisimilia esse volumus, simus ipsi similes eorum qui vere patiuntur, affectibus? et a tali animo proficiscatur oratio qualem facere iudicem volet. Afficiamur antequam afficere conemur."

In the fifth place, It is necessary to attend to the proper language of the passions. We should observe in what manner any one expresses himself who is under the power of a real and a strong passion; and we shall always find his language unaffected and simple. It may be animated, indeed, with bold and strong figures, but it will have no ornament or finery. He is not at leisure to follow out the play of Imagination. His mind being wholly seized by one object, which has heated it, he has no other aim, but to represent that in all its circumstances, as

* “ Ut hominem occisum querar; non omnia quæ in re presenti “ accidisse credibile est, in oculis habebō? Non percussor ille “ subitus erumpet? non expavescet circumventus? exclamabit, “ vel rogabit, vel fugiet? non ferientem, non concidentem videbō?
 “ non animo sanguis, et pallor, et gemitus, extremus denique “ expirantis hiatus, insidet?— Ubi vero miseratione opus erit, “ nobis ea de quibus querimur accidisse credamus, atque id animo “ nostro persuadeamus. Nos illi simus, quos gravia, indigna, “ tristia, passos queramur. Nec agamus rem quasi alienam; sed “ assumamus parumper illum dolorem. Ita dicemus, quæ in “ simili nostro casu dicturi essemus.” Lib. 6.

strongly as he feels it. This must be the Style of the Orator when he would be Pathetic; and this will be his Style, if he speaks from real feeling; bold, ardent, simple. No sort of description will then succeed, but what is written "fervente calamo." If he stay till he can work up his Style and polish and adorn it, he will infallibly cool his own ardour; and then he will touch the heart no more. His composition will become frigid; it will be the language of one who describes, but who does not feel. We must take notice, that there is a great difference between painting to the imagination, and painting to the heart. The one may be done coolly and at leisure: the other must always be rapid and ardent. In the former, art and labour may be suffered to appear; in the latter, no effect can follow, unless it seem to be the work of nature only.

In the sixth place, Avoid interweaving any thing of a foreign nature with the pathetic part of a Discourse. Beware of all digressions, which may interrupt or turn aside the natural course of the passion, when once it begins to rise and swell. Sacrifice all beauties, however bright and showy, which would divert the mind from the principal object, and which would amuse the imagination, rather than touch the heart. Hence comparisons are always dangerous, and generally quite improper, in the midst of passion. Beware even of reasoning unseasonably; or at least, of carrying on a long and subtile train of reasoning, on occasions when the principal aim is to excite warm emotions.

In the last place, Never attempt prolonging the Pathetic too much. Warm emotions are too violent to be lasting.* Study the proper time of making a retreat; of making a transition from the passionate to the calm tone; in such a manner, however, as to descend without falling, by keeping up the same strain of Sentiment that was carried on before, though now expressing it with more moderation. Above all things, beware of straining passion too far; of attempting to raise it to unnatural heights. Preserve always a due regard to what the hearers will bear; and remember, that he who stops not at the proper point; who attempts to carry them farther, in passion, than they will follow him, destroys his whole design. By endeavouring to warm them too much, he takes the most effectual method of freezing them completely.

Having given these rules concerning the Pathetic, I shall give one example from Cicero, which will serve to illustrate several of them, particularly the last. It shall be taken from his last Oration against Verres, wherein he describes the cruelty exercised by Verres, when Governor of Sicily against one Gavius, a Roman citizen. This Gavius had made his escape from prison, into which he had been thrown by the Governor; and when just embarking at Messina, thinking himself now safe, had uttered some threats that when he had once arrived at Rome, Verres should hear of him, and be brought to account for having put a Roman citizen in chains. The Chief magistrate of Messina, a creature of Verres's, instantly apprehends him, and gives information of his threatenings. The behaviour of Verres, on this occasion, is described in the most picturesque manner, and with all the colours which were proper, in order to excite against him the public indignation. He thanks the magistrate of Messina for his diligence. Filled with rage, he comes into the Forum; orders Gavius to be brought forth, the executioners to attend, and against the laws, and contrary to the well-known privileges of a Roman citizen, commands him to be stripped naked, bound, and scourged publicly in a cruel manner. Cicero then proceeds thus: "Cædebatur virgis, in medio foro Messanæ, civis Romanus, Judices!" every word rises above another in describing this flagrant enormity; and, "Judices," is brought out at the end with the greatest propriety: "Cædebatur virgis, in medio foro Messanæ, civis Romanus, Judices! cum interea, nullus gemitus, nulla vox alia istius miseri, inter dolorem crepitumque plagarum audiebatur, nisi hæc, Civis Romanus sum. Hæc se commemoratione civitatis, omnia verbera depulsurum a corpore arbitrabatur. Is non modo hoc non perfecit, ut virgarum vim deprecaretur, sed cum imploraret sæpius usurparetque nomen civis, crux, crux inquam, infelici isto & ærumnoso, qui nunquam istam potestatem viderat, comparabatur. O nomen dulce libertatis! O jus eximium nostræ civitatis! O Lex Porcia, legesque Sempronæ! — Huccine omnia tandem reciderunt, ut civis Romanus, in provincia populi Romani, in oppido fœdera-

* “ Nunquam debet esse longa miseratio; nam cum veros dolores mitiget tempus, citius evenescat, necesse est illa, quam dicendo effinximus, imago: in qua, si moramur, lacrymis fatigatur auditor, et requiescit, et ab illo quem ceperat impetu, in rationem redit. Non patiamur igitur frigescere hoc opus; et affectum, cum ad summum perduxerimus, relinquamus; nec speremus fore, ut aliena mala quisquam diu ploret.”

“ torum, ab eo qui beneficio populi Romani fasces et “ secures haberet, deligatus, in foro, virgis cædere-“ tur!” *

Nothing can be finer, nor better conducted than this passage. The circumstances are well chosen for exciting both the compassion of his hearers for Gavius; and their indignation against Verres. The Style is simple; and the passionate Exclamation, the Address to Liberty and the Laws, is well timed, and in the proper style of Passion. The Orator goes on to exaggerated Verres's cruelty still farther, by another very striking circumstance. He ordered a gibbet to be erected for Gavius, not in the common place of execution, but just by the sea-shore, over against the coast of Italy, “ Let him,” said he, “ who boasts so “ much of his being a Roman citizen, take a view

* “ In the midst of the market-place of Messina, a Roman “ Citizen, O Judges! was cruelly scourged with rods; when, in “ the mean time, amidst the noise of the blows which he suffered,
 “ no voice, no complaint of this unhappy man was heard, except “ this exclamation, Remember that I am a Roman citizen! By “ pleading this privilege of his birthright, he hoped to have “ stopped the strokes of the executioner. But his hopes were “ vain; for, so far was he from being able to obtain thereby any “ mitigation of his torture, that when he continued to repeat this “ exclamation, and to plead the rights of a citizen, a cross, a “ cross, I say, was preparing to be set up for the execution of “ this unfortunate person, who never before had beheld that “ instrument of cruel death. O sacred and honoured name of “ Liberty! O boasted and revered privilege of a Roman Citizen!
 “ O ye Porcian and Sempronian Laws! to this issue have ye all “ come, that a Citizen of Rome, in a province of the Roman “ empire, within an allied city, should publicly, in a market place, “ be loaded with chains, and beaten with rods, at the command of “ one who, from the favour of the Roman people alone, derived
 “ all his authority and ensigns of power!”

“ from his gibbet of his own country. — This base “ insult over a dying man is the least part of his “ guilt. It was not Gavius alone that Verres meant “ to insult; but it was you, O Romans! it was every “ citizen who now hears me; in the person of Gavius,
 “ he scoffed at your rights, and shewed in what con“ tempt he held the Roman name, and Roman “ liberties.”

Hitherto all is beautiful, animated, pathetic; and the model would have been perfect, if Cicero had stopped at this point. But his redundant and florid genius carried him farther. He must needs interest not his hearers only, but the beasts, the mountains, and the stones, against Verres: “ Si hæc non ad “ cives Romanos, non ad amicos nostræ civitatis, “ non ad eos qui populi Romani nomen audissent;
 “ denique si non ad homines, verum ad bestias;
 “ atque ut longius progrediar, si in aliqua desertis“ sima solitudine, ad saxa et ad scopulos hæc con“ queri et deplorare vellem, tamen omnia muta atque
 “ inanima, tantâ et tam indignâ rerum atrocitate
 “ commoverentur.” * This, with all the deference due to so eloquent an Orator, we must pronounce to be Declamatory, not Pathetic. This is straining the language of Passion too far. Every hearer sees this immediately to be a studied figure of Rhetoric; it may amuse him, but instead of inflaming him more, it, in truth, cools his passion. So dangerous it is to give scope to a flowery imagination, when one intends to make a strong and passionate impression.

* “ Were I employed in lamenting those instances of an atrocious oppression and cruelty, not among an assembly of Roman citizens, not among the allies of our state, not among those who had ever heard the name of the Roman people, not even among human creatures, but in the midst of the brute creation; and to go farther, were I pouring forth my lamentations to the stones, and to the rocks, in some remote and desert wilderness, even those mute and inanimate beings would, at the recital of such shocking indignities, be thrown into commotion.”

No other part of Discourse remains now to be treated of, except the Peroration or Conclusion. Concerning this, it is needless to say much, because it must vary so considerably, according to the strain of the preceding Discourse. Sometimes the whole pathetic part comes in most properly at the Peroration. Sometimes, when the Discourse has been entirely argumentative, it is fit to conclude with summing up the arguments, placing them in one view, and leaving the impression of them full and strong on the mind of the audience. For the great rule of a Conclusion, and what nature obviously suggests, is, to place that last on which we chuse that the strength of our cause should rest.

In Sermons, inferences from what has been said, make a common Conclusion. With regard to these, care should be taken, not only that they rise naturally, but (what is less commonly attended to) that they should so much agree with the strain of sentiment throughout the Discourse, as not to break the Unity of the Sermon. For inferences, how justly soever they may be deduced from the doctrine of the text, yet have a bad effect, if, at the Conclusion of a Discourse, they introduce some subject altogether new, and turn off our attention from the main object to which the Preacher had directed our thoughts. They appear, in this case, like excrescences jutting out from the body, which form an unnatural addition to it; and tend to enfeeble the impression which the Composition, as a whole, is calculated to make.

The most eloquent of the French, perhaps, indeed, of all modern Orators, Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, terminates in a very moving manner, his funeral Oration on the great Prince of Condé, with this return upon himself, and his old age: "Accept, O Prince! these last efforts of a voice which you once well knew. With you all my funeral Discourses are now to end. Instead of deploring the death of others, henceforth, it shall be my study to learn from you, how my own may be blessed. Happy, if warned by those grey hairs, of the account which I must soon give of my ministry, I reserve, solely for that flock whom I ought to feed with the word of life, the feeble remains of a voice which now trembles, and of an ardor which is now on the point of being extinct." *

In all Discourses, it is a matter of importance to hit the precise time of concluding, so as to bring our Discourse just to a point; neither ending abruptly and unexpectedly; nor disappointing the expectation of the hearers, when they look for the close; and continuing to hover round and round the conclusion, till they become heartily tired of us. We should endeavour to go off with a good grace; not to end with a languishing and drawling sentence; but to close with dignity and spirit, that we may leave the minds of the hearers warm; and dismiss them with a favourable impression of the subject and of the Speaker.

* "Agrééz ces derniers efforts d'une voix que vous fut connue. Vous mettez fin à tous ces discours. Au lieu de deplorer la mort des autres, Grand Prince! dorenavant je veux apprendre de vous, à rendre la mienne sainte. Heureux, si averti par ces cheveux blancs, du compte que je dois rendre de mon administration, je reserve au troupeau que je dois nourrir de la parole de vie, les restes d'une voix qui tombe, & d'une ardeur qui s'éteint."—These are the last sentences of that Oration; but the whole of the Peroration from that passage, "Venez, peuples, maintenant," &c. though it is too long for insertion, is a great master-piece of Pathetic Eloquence.

LECTURE XXXIII.

PRONUNCIATION, OR DELIVERY.

HAVING treated of several general heads relating to Eloquence, or Public Speaking, I now proceed to another very important part of the subject yet remaining, that is, the Pronunciation, or Delivery of a Discourse. How much stress was laid upon this by the most eloquent of all Orators, Demosthenes, appears from a noted saying of his, related both by Cicero and Quintilian; when being asked, What was the first point in Oratory? he answered Delivery; and being asked, What was the second? and afterwards, What was the third? he still answered, Delivery. There is no wonder that he should have rated this so high, and that for improving himself in it, he should have employed those assiduous and painful labours, which all the ancients take so much notice of; for, beyond doubt, nothing is of more importance. To superficial thinkers, the management of the voice and gesture, in Public Speaking, may appear to relate to Decoration only, and to be one of the inferior arts of catching an audience. But this is far from being the case. It is intimately connected with what is, or ought to be, the end of all Public Speaking, Persuasion; and therefore deserves the study of the most grave and serious Speakers, as much as of those whose only aim is to please.

For, let it be considered, whenever we address ourselves to others by words, our intention certainly is to make some impression on those to whom we speak; it is to convey to them our own ideas and emotions. Now the tone of our voice, our looks, and gestures, interpret our ideas and emotions no less than words do; nay, the impression they make on others, is frequently much stronger than any that words can make. We often see, that an expressive look, or a passionate cry, unaccompanied by words, conveys to others more forcible ideas, and rouses within them stronger passions, than can be communicated by the most eloquent Discourse. The signification of our sentiments, made by tones and gestures, has this advantage above that made by words, that it is the language of nature. It is that method of interpreting our mind which nature has dictated to all, and which is understood by all; whereas words are only arbitrary conventional symbols of our ideas; and, by consequence, must make a more feeble impression. So true is this, that, to render words fully significant, they must, almost in every case, receive some aid from the manner of Pronunciation and Delivery; and he who, in speaking, should employ bare words, without enforcing them by proper tones and accents, would leave us with a faint and indistinct impression, often with a doubtful and ambiguous conception, of what he had delivered. Nay, so close is the connection between certain sentiments and the proper manner of pronouncing them, that he who does not pronounce them after that manner, can never persuade us, that he believes, or feels, the sentiments themselves. His Delivery may be such as to give the lie to all that he asserts. When Marcus Callidius accused one of an attempt to poison him, but enforced his accusation in a languid manner, and without any warmth or earnestness of Delivery, Cicero, who pleaded for the accused person, improved this into an argument of the falsity of the charge, “An tu, M. Callidi, nisi fingeres, sic “ageres?” In Shakespeare’s Richard II. the Duchess of York thus impeaches the sincerity of her husband:

Pleas he in earnest! Look upon his face,
 His eyes do drop no tears; his prayers are jest;
 His words come from his mouth; ours, from our breast;
 He prays but faintly, and would be denied;
 We pray with heart and soul.

But, I believe, it is needless to say any more in order to shew the high importance of a good Delivery: I proceed, therefore, to such observations as appear to me most useful to be made on this head.

The great objects which every Public Speaker will naturally have in his eye in forming his Delivery, are, first, to speak so as to be fully and easily understood by all who hear him; and next, to speak with grace and force, so as to please and to move his Audience. Let us consider what is most important with respect to each of these. *

In order to be fully and easily understood, the four chief requisites are, a due degree of Loudness of Voice; Distinctness; Slowness; and Propriety of Pronunciation.

The first attention of every Public Speaker, doubtless, must be to make himself be heard by all those to whom he speaks. He must endeavour to fill with his voice the space occupied by the Assembly. This power of voice, it may be thought, is wholly a natural talent. It is so in a good measure; but, however, may receive considerable assistance from art. Much depends for this purpose on the proper pitch, and management of the voice. Every man has three pitches in his voice; the High, the Middle, and the Low one. The High, is that which he uses in calling aloud to some one at a distance. The Low is, when he approaches to a whisper. The Middle is, that which he employs in common conversation, and which he should generally use in Public Discourse. For it is a great mistake, to imagine that one must take the highest pitch of his voice, in order to be well heard by a great Assembly. This is confounding two things which are different, Loudness, or Strength of Sound, with the key, or note on which we speak. A Speaker may render his voice louder, without altering the key; and we shall always be able to give most body, most persevering force of sound, to that pitch of voice to which in conversation we are accustomed. Whereas, by setting out on our highest pitch or key, we certainly allow ourselves less compass, and are likely to strain our voice before we have done. We shall fatigue ourselves, and speak with pain; and whenever a man speaks with pain to himself, he is always heard with pain by his Audience. Give the voice, therefore, full strength and swell of sound; but always pitch it on your ordinary speaking key. Make it a constant rule never to utter a greater quantity of voice, than you can afford without pain to yourselves, and without any extraordinary effort. As long as you keep within these bounds, the other organs of speech will be at liberty to discharge their several offices with ease; and you will always have your voice under command. But whenever you transgress these bounds, you give up the reins, and have no longer any management of it. It is an useful rule too, in order to be well heard, to fix our eye on some of the most distant persons in the assembly, and to consider ourselves as speaking to them. We naturally and mechanically utter our words with such a degree of strength, as to make ourselves be heard by one to whom we address ourselves, provided he be within the reach of our voice. As this is the case in common conversation, it will hold also in Public Speaking. But remember, that in public as well as in conversation, it is possible to offend by speaking too loud. This extreme hurts the ear, by making the voice come upon it in rumbling indistinct masses; besides its giving the Speaker the disagreeable appearance of one who endeavours to compel assent, by mere vehemence and force of sound.

* On this whole subject, Mr. Sheridan's Lectures on Elocution are very worthy of being consulted; and several hints are here taken from them.

In the next place, to being well heard, and clearly understood, distinctness of articulation contributes more, perhaps, than mere loudness of sound. The quantity of sound necessary to fill even a large space, is smaller than is commonly imagined: and with distinct articulation, a man of a weak voice will make it reach farther than the strongest voice can reach without it. To this, therefore, every Public Speaker ought to pay great attention. He must give every sound which he utters its due proportion, and make every syllable, and even every letter in the word which he pronounces, be heard distinctly; without slurring, whispering, or suppressing any of the proper sounds.

In the third place, in order to articulate distinctly, moderation is requisite with regard to the speed of pronouncing. Precipitancy of Speech confounds all articulation, and all meaning. I need scarcely observe, that there may be also an extreme on the opposite side. It is obvious, that a lifeless, drawling Pronunciation, which allows the minds of the hearers to be always outrunning the Speaker, must render every Discourse insipid and fatiguing. But the extreme of speaking too fast is much more common, and requires the more to be guarded against, because, when it has grown up into a habit, few errors are more difficult to be corrected. To pronounce with a proper degree of slowness, and with a full and clear Articulation, is the first thing to be studied by all who begin to speak in public; and cannot be too much recommended to them. Such a Pronunciation gives weight and dignity to their Discourse. It is a great assistance to the voice, by the pauses and rests which it allows it more easily to make; and it enables the Speaker to swell all his sounds both with more force and more music. It assists him also in preserving a due command of himself; whereas a rapid and hurried manner is apt to excite the flutter of spirits, which is the greatest enemy to all right execution in the way of Oratory. "Promptum sit os," says Quintilian, "non præceps, moderatum, non lentum."

After these fundamental attentions to the pitch and management of the voice, to distinct articulation, and to a proper degree of slowness of speech, what a Public Speaker must, in the fourth place, study, is, propriety of Pronunciation; or the giving to every word which he utters, that sound, which the most polite usage of the language appropriates to it; in opposition to broad, vulgar, or provincial Pronunciation. This is requisite, both for speaking intelligibly, and for speaking with grace or beauty. Instructions concerning this article can be given by the living voice only. But there is one observation, which it may not be improper here to make. In the English language, every word which consists of more syllables than one, has one accented syllable. The accent rests sometimes on the vowel, sometimes on the consonant. Seldom, or never, is there more than one accented syllable in any English word, however long; and the genius of the language requires the voice to mark that syllable by a stronger percussion, and to pass more slightly over the rest. Now, after we have learned the proper seats of these accents, it is an important rule, to give every word just the same accent in Public Speaking, as in Common Discourse. Many persons err in this respect. When they speak in Public, and with solemnity, they pronounce the syllables in a different manner from what they do at other times. They dwell upon them, and protract them ; they multiply accents on the same word ; from a mistaken notion, that it gives gravity and force to their discourse, and adds to the pomp of Public Declamation. Whereas, this is one of the greatest faults that can be committed in Pronunciation ; it makes what is called a theatrical or mouth-ing manner ; and gives an artificial affected air to Speech, which detracts greatly both from its agreeableness, and its impression.

I proceed to treat next of those higher parts of delivery, by studying which, a Speaker has something farther in view than merely to render himself intelligible, and seeks to give grace and force to what he utters. These may be comprised under four heads, Emphasis, Pauses, Tones, and Gestures. Let me only premise in general, to what I am to say concerning them, that attention to these articles of delivery is by no means to be confined, as some might be apt to imagine, to the more elaborate and pathetic parts of a Discourse. There is, perhaps, as great attention requisite, and as much skill displayed, in adapting Emphasis, Pauses, Tones, and Gestures, properly, to calm and plain speaking ; and the effect of a just and graceful delivery will, in every part of a subject, be found of high importance for commanding attention, and enforcing what is spoken.

First, Let us consider Emphasis ; by this, is meant a stronger and fuller sound of voice, by which we distinguish the accented syllable of some word, on which we design to lay particular stress, and to shew how it affects the rest of the Sentence. Sometimes the emphatic word must be distinguished by a particular tone of voice, as well as by a stronger accent.

On the right management of the Emphasis depend the whole life and spirit of every discourse. If no Emphasis be placed on any words, not only is Discourse rendered heavy and lifeless, but the meaning left often ambiguous. If the Emphasis be placed wrong, we pervert and confound the meaning wholly. To give a common instance; such a simple question as this, “Do you ride to town to-day?” is capable of no fewer than four different acceptations, according as the Emphasis is differently placed on the words. If it be pronounced thus: Do you ride to town to-day? the answer may naturally be, No; I send my servant in my stead. If thus; Do you ride to town to-day? Answer, No, I intend to walk. Do you ride to town to-day? No; I ride out into the fields. Do you ride to town to-day? No; but I shall to-morrow: In like manner, in solemn Discourse, the whole force and beauty of an expression often depend on the accented word; and we may present to the hearers quite different views of the same Sentiment, by placing the Emphasis differently. In the following words of our Saviour, observe in what different lights the thought is placed, according as the words are pronounced: “Judas, betrayest thou the “Son of Man with a kiss?” betrayest thou — makes the reproach turn on the infamy of treachery. Betrayest thou — makes it rest, upon Judas’s connection with his master. Betrayest thou the Son of Man — rests it, upon our Saviour’s personal character and eminence. Betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss? — turns it, upon his prostituting the signal of peace and friendship, to the purpose of a mark of destruction.

In order to acquire the proper management of the emphasis, the great rule, and indeed the only rule possible to be given is, that the Speaker study to attain a just conception of the force and spirit of those sentiments which he is to pronounce. For to lay the Emphasis with exact propriety, is a constant exercise of good sense and attention. It is far from being an inconsiderable attainment. It is one of the greatest trials of a true and just taste; and must arise from feeling delicately ourselves, and from judging accurately, of what is fittest to strike the feelings of others. There is as great a difference between a Chapter of the Bible, or any other piece of plain prose, read by one who places the several Emphases every where with taste and judgment, and by one who neglects or mistakes them, as there is between the same tune played by the most masterly hand, or by the most bungling performer.

In all prepared Discourses, it would be of great use, if they were read over or rehearsed in private, with this particular view, to search for the proper Emphases before they were pronounced in public; marking, at the same time, with a pen, the emphatical words in every sentence, or at least in the most weighty and affecting parts, of the Discourse, and fixing them well in memory. Were this attention oftener bestowed, were this part of Pronunciation studied with more exactness, and not left to the moment of delivery, as is commonly done, Public Speakers would find their care abundantly repaid, by the remarkable effects which it would produce upon their audience. Let me caution, at the same time, against one error, that of multiplying emphatical words too much. It is only by a prudent reserve in the use of them, that we can give them any weight.

If they recur too often; if a speaker attempts to render every thing which he says of high importance, by a multitude of strong Emphases, we soon learn to pay little regard to them. To crowd every Sentence with emphatical words, is like crowding all the pages of a Book with Italick Characters, which, as to the effect, is just the same with using no such distinctions at all.

Next to Emphasis, the Pauses in Speaking demand attention. These are of two kinds; first, Emphatical Pauses; and next, such as mark the distinctions of Sense. An Emphatical Pause is made, after something has been said of peculiar moment, and on which we want to fix the hearer's attention. Sometimes before such a thing is said, we usher it in with a pause of this nature. Such pauses have the same effect as a strong Emphasis; and are subject to the same rules; especially to the caution just now given, of not repeating them too frequently. For as they excite uncommon attention, and of course raise expectation, if the importance of the matter be not fully answerable to such expectation, they occasion disappointment and disgust.

But the most frequent and the principal use of pauses, is to mark the divisions of the sense, and at the same time to allow the Speaker to draw his breath; and the proper and graceful adjustment of such pauses, is one of the most nice and difficult articles in delivery. In all Public Speaking, the management of the breath requires a good deal of care, so as not to be obliged to divide words from one another, which have so intimate a connection, that they ought to be pronounced with the same breath, and without the least separation. Many a sentence is miserably mangled, and the force of the Emphasis totally lost, by divisions being made in the wrong place. To avoid this, every one, while he is speaking, should be very careful to provide a full supply of breath for what he is to utter. It is a great mistake to imagine, that the breath must be drawn only at the end of a period, when the voice is allowed to fall. It may easily be gathered at the intervals of the period, when the voice is only suspended for a moment; and, by this management, one may have always a sufficient stock for carrying on the longest sentence, without improper interruptions.

If any one, in Public Speaking, shall have formed to himself a certain melody or tune, which requires rest and pauses of its own, distinct from those of the sense, he has, undoubtedly, contracted one of the worst habits into which a Public Speaker can fall. It is the sense which should always rule the pauses of the voice; for wherever there is any sensible suspension of the voice, the hearer is always led to expect somewhat corresponding in the meaning. Pauses, in Public Discourse, must be formed upon the manner in which we utter ourselves in ordinary, sensible conversation; and not upon the stiff artificial manner which we acquire, from reading books according to the common punctuation. The general run of punctuation is very arbitrary; often capricious and false; and dictates an uniformity of tone in the pauses, which is extremely disagreeable: for we are to observe, that to render pauses graceful and expressive, they must not only be made in the right place, but also be accompanied with a proper tone of voice, by which the nature of these pauses is intimated; much more than by the length of them, which can never be exactly measured. Sometimes it is only a slight and simple suspension of voice that is proper; sometimes a degree of cadence in the voice is required; and sometimes that peculiar tone and cadence, which denote the sentence finished. In all these cases, we are to regulate ourselves, by attending to the manner in which Nature teaches us to speak, when engaged in real and earnest discourse with others.

When we are reading or reciting verse, there is a peculiar difficulty in making the pauses justly. The difficulty arises from the melody of verse, which dictates to the ear pauses or rests of its own; and to adjust and compound these properly with the pauses of the sense, so as neither to hurt the ear, nor offend the understanding, is so very nice a matter, that it is no wonder we so seldom meet with good readers of poetry. There are two kinds of pauses that belong to the music of verse; one is, the pause at the end of the line; and the other, the cæsural pause in the middle of it. With regard to the pause at the end of the line; which marks that strain or verse to be finished, rhyme renders this always sensible, and in some measure compels us to observe it in our Pronunciation. In blank verse, where there is a greater liberty permitted of running the lines into one another, sometimes without any suspension in the sense, it has been made a question, Whether in reading such verse with propriety, any regard at all should be paid to the close of a line? On the Stage, where the appearance of speaking in verse should always be avoided, there can, I think, be no doubt, that the close of such lines as make no pause in the sense, should not be rendered perceptible to the ear.

But on other occasions, this were improper: for what is the use of melody, or for what end has the Poet composed in verse, if, in reading his lines, we suppress his numbers; and degrade them, by our pronunciation, into mere prose? We ought, therefore, certainly to read blank verse so as to make every line sensible to the ear. At the same time, in doing so, every appearance of sing-song and tone must be carefully guarded against. The close of the line, where it makes no pause in the meaning, ought to be marked, not by such a tone as is used in finishing a sentence; but without either letting the voice fall, or elevating it, it should be marked only by such a slight suspension of sound, as may distinguish the passage from one line to another without injuring the meaning.

The other kind of musical pause, is that which falls somewhere about the middle of the verse, and divides it into two hemistichs; a pause, not so great as that which belongs to the close of the line, but still sensible to an ordinary ear. This, which is called the cæsural pause, in the French heroic verse falls uniformly in the middle of the line. In the English, it may fall after the 4th, 5th, 6th, or 7th syllables in the line, and no other. Where the verse is so constructed, that this cæsural pause coincides with the slightest pause or division in the sense, the line can be read easily; as in the two first verses of Mr. Pope's Messiah:

Ye nymphs of Solyma! begin the song;
To heavenly themes, sublimer strains belong.

But if it shall happen that words, which have such a strict and intimate connection as not to bear even a momentary separation, are divided from one another by this cæsural pause, we then feel a sort of struggle between the sense and the sound, which renders it difficult to read such lines gracefully. The rule of proper Pronunciation in such cases is, to regard only the pause which the sense forms; and to read the line accordingly. The neglect of the cæsural pause may make the line sound somewhat unharmoniously; but the effect would be much worse, if the sense were sacrificed to the sound. For instance, in the following line of Milton:

————— What in me is dark,
 Illumine; what is low, raise and support —

The sense clearly dictates the pause after “illumine,” at the end of the third syllable, which, in reading, ought to be made accordingly; though, if the melody only were to be regarded, “illumine” should be connected with what follows, and the pause not made till the 4th or 6th syllable. So, in the following line of Mr. Pope’s (Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot):

I sit, with sad civility I read —

The ear plainly points out the cæsural pause, as falling after “sad,” the 4th syllable. But it would be very bad reading to make any pause there, so as to separate “sad” and “civility.” The sense admits of no other pause than after the second syllable “sit,” which therefore must be the only pause made in the reading.

I proceed to treat next of Tones in Pronunciation, which are different both from emphasis and pauses; consisting in the modulation of the voice, the notes or variations of sound which we employ in Public Speaking. How much of the propriety, the force and grace of Discourse, must depend on these, will appear from this single consideration ; that to almost every sentiment we utter, more especially to every strong emotion, Nature hath adapted some peculiar tone of voice ; insomuch, that he who should tell another that he was very angry, or much grieved, in a tone which did not suit such emotions, instead of being believed, would be laughed at. Sympathy is one of the most powerful principles by which Persuasive Discourse works its effect. The Speaker endeavours to transfuse into his hearers his own sentiments and emotions ; which he can never be successful in doing, unless he utters them in such a manner as to convince the hearers that he feels them.* The proper expression of tones, therefore, deserves to be attentively studied by every one who would be a successful Orator.

The greatest and most material instruction which can be given for this purpose is, to form the tones of

* “ All that passes in the mind of man may be reduced to two classes, which I call Ideas and Emotions. By Ideas, I mean all thoughts which rise and pass in succession in the mind. By Emotions, all exertions of the mind in arranging, combining, and separating its ideas ; as well as all the effects produced on the mind itself by those ideas, from the more violent agitation of the passions, to the calmer feelings produced by the operation of the intellect and the fancy. In short, thought is the object of the one, internal feeling of the other. That which serves to express the former, I call the Language of Ideas ; and the latter, the Language of Emotions. Words are the signs of the one, tones of the other. Without the use of these two sorts of Language, it is impossible to communicate through the ear all that passes in the mind of man.”

Public Speaking upon the tones of sensible and animated conversation. We may observe, that every man, when he is much in earnest in common Discourse, when he is engaged in speaking on some subject which interests him nearly, has an eloquent or persuasive tone and manner. What is the reason of our being often so frigid and unpersuasive in Public Discourse, but our departing from the natural tone of Speaking, and delivering ourselves in an affected artificial manner. Nothing can be more absurd than to imagine, that as soon as one mounts a Pulpit, or rises in a Public Assembly, he is instantly to lay aside the voice with which he expresses himself in private; to assume a new, studied tone, and a cadence altogether foreign to his natural manner. This has vitiated all delivery; this has given rise to cant and tedious monotony, in the different kinds of modern Public Speaking, especially in the Pulpit. Men departed from Nature; and sought to give a beauty or force, as they imagined, to their Discourse, by substituting certain studied musical tones, in the room of the genuine expressions of sentiment, which the voice carries in natural Discourse. Let every Public Speaker guard against this error. Whether he speak in a private room, or in a great Assembly, let him remember that he still speaks. Follow Nature; consider how she teaches you to utter any sentiment or feeling of your heart. Imagine a subject of debate started in conversation among grave and wise men, and yourself bearing a share in it. Think after what manner, with what tones and inflexions of voice, you would on such an occasion express yourself, when you were most in earnest, and sought most to be listened to. Carry these with you to the Bar, to the Pulpit, or to any Public Assembly; let these be the foundation of your manner of pronouncing there; and you will take the surest method of rendering your delivery both agreeable and persuasive.

I have said, Let these conversation tones be the foundation of Public Pronunciation; for, on some occasions, solemn Public Speaking requires them to be exalted beyond the strain of common Discourse. In a formal studied Oration, the elevation of the Style, and the harmony of the sentences, prompt, almost necessarily, a modulation of voice more rounded, and bordering more upon music, than conversation admits. This gives rise to what is called the Declaiming Manner. But though this mode of Pronunciation runs considerably beyond ordinary Discourse, yet still it must have for its basis, the natural tones of grave and dignified conversation. I must observe, at the same time, that the constant indulgence of a declamatory manner is not favourable either to a good composition, or good delivery; and is in hazard of betraying Public Speakers into that monotony of tone and cadence, which is so generally complained of. Whereas, he who forms the general run of his delivery upon a speaking manner, is not likely ever to become disagreeable through monotony. He will have the same natural variety in his tones, which a person has in conversation. Indeed, the perfection of delivery requires both these different manners, that of speaking with liveliness and ease, and that of declaiming with stateliness and dignity, to be possessed by one man; and to be employed by him, according as the different parts of his Discourse require either the one or the other.

This is a perfection which is not attained by many; the greatest part of Public Speakers allowing their delivery to be formed altogether accidentally; according as some turn of voice appears to them most beautiful, or some artificial model has caught their fancy; and acquiring, by this means, a habit of Pronunciation, which they can never vary. But the capital direction, which ought never to be forgotten, is, to copy the proper tones for expressing every sentiment from those which Nature dictates to us, in conversation with others; to speak always with her voice; and not to form to ourselves a fantastic public manner, from an absurd fancy of its being more beautiful than a natural one.*

It now remains to treat of Gesture, or what is called Action in public Discourse. Some nations animate their words in common conversation, with many more motions of the body than others do. The French and the Italians are, in this respect, much more sprightly than we. But there is no nation, hardly any person so phlegmatic, as not to accompany their words with some actions and gesticulations, on all occasions, when they are much in earnest. It is therefore unnatural in a Public Speaker, it is inconsistent with that earnestness and

* "Loquere," (says an Author of the last century, who has written a Treatise in Verse, de Gestu et Voce Oratoris,) — "Loquere; hoc vitium commune, loquatur

" Ut nemo; at tensâ declanitet omnia voce.

" Tu loquere, ut mos est hominum; boat & latrat ille;

" Ille ululat; rudit hic; (fari si talia dignum est)

" Non hominem vox ulla sonat ratione loquentem."

JOHANNES LUCAS, de Gestu et Voce,

Lib. II. Paris, 1675.

seriousness which he ought to shew in all affairs of moment, to remain quite unmoved in his outward appearance, and to let the words drop from his mouth, without any expression of meaning, or warmth in his gesture.

The fundamental rule as to propriety of action, is undoubtedly the same with what I gave as to propriety of tone. Attend to the looks and gestures, in which earnestness, indignation, compassion, or any other emotion, discovers itself to most advantage in the common intercourse of men; and let these be your model. Some of these looks and gestures are common to all men; and there are also certain peculiarities of manner which distinguish every individual. A public Speaker must take that manner which is most natural to himself. For it is here, just as in tones. It is not the business of a Speaker to form to himself a certain set of motions and gestures, which he thinks most becoming and agreeable, and to practise these in public, without their having any correspondence to the manner which is natural to him in private. His gestures and motions ought all to carry that kind of expression which nature has dictated to him; and unless this be the case, it is impossible, by means of any study, to avoid their appearing stiff and forced.

However, although nature must be the groundwork, I admit that there is room in this matter for some study and art. For many persons are naturally ungraceful in the motions which they make; and this ungracefulness might, in part at least, be reformed by application and care. The study of action in Public Speaking, consists chiefly in guarding against awkward and disagreeable motions, and in learning to perform such as are natural to the Speaker, in the most becoming manner. For this end it has been advised by writers on this subject, to practise before a mirror, where one may see and judge of his own gestures. But I am afraid persons are not always the best judges of the gracefulness of their own motions; and one may declaim long enough before a mirror, without correcting any of his faults. The judgment of a friend, whose good taste they can trust, will be found of much greater advantage to beginners, than any mirror they can use. With regard to particular rules concerning action and gesticulation, Quintilian has delivered a great many, in the last Chapter of the 11th Book of his Institutions; and all the modern writers on this subject have done little else but translate them. I am not of opinion that such rules, delivered either by the voice or on paper, can be of much use, unless persons saw them exemplified before their eyes. *

* The few following hints only I shall adventure to throw out, in case they may be of any service. When speaking in public, one should study to preserve as much dignity as possible, in the whole attitude of the body. An erect posture is generally to be chosen; standing firm, so as to have the fullest and freest command of all his motions; any inclination which is used should be forwards towards the hearers, which is a natural expression of earnestness. As for the countenance, the chief rule is, that it should correspond with the nature of the discourse, and when no particular emotion is expressed, a serious and manly look is always the best. The eyes should never be fixed close on any one object, but move easily round the audience. If the motions made with the hands consists the chief part of gesture in Speaking. The ancients condemned all motions performed by the left hand alone; but I am not sensible that these are always offensive, though it is natural for the right hand to be more frequently employed. Warm emotions demand

I shall only add further on this head, that in order to succeed well in delivery, nothing is more necessary than for a Speaker to guard against a certain flutter of spirits, which is peculiarly incident to those who begin to speak in public. He must endeavour above all things to be recollected, and master of himself. For this end, he will find nothing of more use to him than to study to become wholly engaged in his subject; to be possessed with a sense of its importance or seriousness; to be concerned much more to persuade than to please. He will generally please most, when pleasing is not his sole nor chief aim. This is the only rational and proper method of raising one's self above that timid and bashful regard to an audience, which is so ready to disconcert a Speaker, both as to what he is to say, and as to his manner of saying it.

I cannot conclude without an earnest admonition to guard against all affectation, which is the certain ruin of good delivery. Let your manner, whatever it is, the motion of both hands corresponding together. But whether one gesticulates with one or with both hands, it is an important rule, that all his motions should be free and easy. Narrow and straitened movements are generally ungraceful; for which reason, motions made with the hands are directed to proceed from the shoulder rather than from the elbow. Perpendicular movements too with the hands, that is, in the straight line up and down, which Shakespear, in Hamlet, calls "sawing the air with the hand," are seldom good. Oblique motions are, in general, the most graceful. Too sudden and nimble motions should be likewise avoided. Earnestness can be fully expressed without them. Shakespear's directions on this head are full of good sense; "use all gently," says he; "and in the very torrent and tempest of passion, acquire "a temperance that may give it smoothness."

be your own ; neither imitated from another, nor assumed upon some imaginary model, which is unnatural to you. Whatever is native, even though accompanied with several defects, yet is likely to please ; because it shows us a man ; because it has the appearance of coming from the heart. Whereas a delivery, attended with several acquired graces and beauties, if it be not easy and free, if it betray the marks of art and affectation, never fails to disgust. To attain any extremely correct and perfectly graceful delivery, is what few can expect ; so many natural talents being requisite to concur in forming it. But to attain, what as to the effect is very little inferior, a forcible and persuasive manner, is within the power of most persons ; if they will only unlearn false and corrupt habits ; if they will allow themselves to follow nature, and will speak in public as they do in private, when they speak in earnest and from the heart. If one has naturally any gross defects in his voice or gestures, he begins at the wrong end, if he attempts at reforming them only when he is to speak in public. He should begin with rectifying them in his private manner of Speaking ; and then carry to the public the right habit he has formed. For, when a Speaker is engaged in a Public Discourse, he should not be then employing his attention about his manner, or thinking of his tones and his gestures. If he be so employed, study and affectation will appear. He ought to be then quite in earnest ; wholly occupied with his subject and his sentiments ; leaving Nature, and previously formed habits, to prompt and suggest his manner of delivery.

LECTURE XXXIV.

MEANS OF IMPROVING IN ELOQUENCE.

I HAVE now treated fully of the different kinds of Public Speaking, of the Composition, and of the Delivery of a Discourse. Before I finish this subject, it may be of use to suggest some things concerning the properest means of Improvement in the Art of Public Speaking, and the most necessary studies for that purpose.

To be an Eloquent Speaker, in the proper sense of the word, is far from being either a common or an easy attainment. Indeed, to compose a florid harangue on some popular topic, and to deliver it so as to amuse an Audience, is a matter not very difficult. But though some praise be due to this, yet the idea which I have endeavoured to give of Eloquence, is much higher. It is a great exertion of the human powers. It is the Art of being persuasive and commanding; the Art, not of pleasing the fancy merely; but of speaking both to the understanding and to the heart; of interesting the hearers in such a degree, as to seize and carry them along with us; and to leave them with a deep and strong impression of what they have heard. How many talents, natural and acquired, must concur for carrying this to perfection? A strong, lively, and warm imagination; quick sensibility of heart, joined with solid judgment, good sense, and presence of mind; all improved by great and long attention to Style and Composition; and supported also by the exterior, yet important qualifications, of a graceful manner, a presence not ungainly, and a full and tuneable voice. How little reason to wonder, that a perfect and accomplished Orator should be one of the characters that is most rarely to be found?

Let us not despair, however. Between mediocrity and perfection, there is a very wide interval. There are many intermediate spaces, which may be filled up with honour; and the more rare and difficult that complete perfection is, the greater is the honour of approaching to it, though we do not fully attain it. The number of Orators who stand in the highest class is, perhaps, smaller than the number of Poets who are foremost in poetic fame; but the study of Oratory has this advantage above that of Poetry, that, in Poetry, one must be an eminently good performer, or he is not supportable:

— Mediocribus esse Poëtis

*Non homines, non Dî, non concessère columnæ.

In Eloquence this does not hold. There, one may possess a moderate station with dignity. Eloquence admits of a great many different forms; plain and simple, as well as high and pathetic; and a genius

* For God and Man, and lettered post denies,
That Poets ever are of middling size.

that cannot reach the latter, may shine with much reputation and usefulness in the former.

Whether Nature or Art contribute most to form an Orator, is a trifling inquiry. In all attainments whatever, Nature must be the prime agent. She must bestow the original talents. She must sow the seeds; but culture is requisite for bringing these seeds to perfection. Nature must always have done somewhat; but a great deal will always be left to be done by Art. This is certain, that study and discipline are more necessary for the improvement of natural genius in Oratory, than they are in Poetry. What I mean is, that though Poetry be capable of receiving assistance from Critical Art, yet a Poet, without any aid from Art, by the force of genius alone, can rise higher than a Public Speaker can do, who has never given attention to the rules of Style, Composition, and Delivery. Homer formed himself; Demosthenes and Cicero were formed by the help of much labour, and of many assistances derived from the labour of others. After these preliminary observations, let us proceed to the main design of this Lecture; to treat of the means to be used for improvement in Eloquence.

In the first place, What stands highest in the order of means, is personal character and disposition. In order to be a truly eloquent or persuasive Speaker, nothing is more necessary than to be a virtuous man. This was a favourite position among the ancient Rhetoricians: "Non posse Oratorem esse nisi virum bonum." To find any such connection between virtue and one of the highest liberal arts, must give pleasure; and it can, I think, be clearly shown, that this is not a mere topic of declamation, but that the connection here alleged, is undoubtedly founded in truth and reason.

For, consider first, Whether any thing contribute more to persuasion, than the opinion which we entertain of the probity, disinterestedness, candour, and other good moral qualities of the person who endeavours to persuade? These give weight and force to every thing which he utters; nay, they add a beauty to it; they dispose us to listen with attention and pleasure; and create a secret partiality in favour of that side which he espouses. Whereas, if we entertain a suspicion of craft and disingenuity, of a corrupt, or a base mind, in the Speaker, his Eloquence loses all its real effect. It may entertain and amuse; but it is viewed as artifice, as trick, as the play only of Speech; and, viewed in this light, whom can it persuade? We even read a book with more pleasure, when we think favourably of its Author; but when we have the living Speaker before our eyes, addressing us personally on some subject of importance, the opinion we entertain of his character must have a much more powerful effect.

But, lest it should be said, that this relates only to the character of Virtue, which one may maintain, without being at bottom a truly worthy man, I must observe farther, that besides the weight which it adds to Character, real Virtue operates also, in other ways, to the advantage of Eloquence.

First, nothing is so favourable as Virtue to the prosecution of honourable studies. It prompts a generous emulation to excel; it inures to industry; it leaves the mind vacant and free, master of itself, disencumbered of those bad passions, and disengaged from those mean pursuits, which have ever been found the greatest enemies to true proficiency. Quintilian has touched this consideration very properly: “ Quod si agrorum nimia cura, et sollicitior rei familiaris diligentia, et venandi voluptas, & dati spectaculis dies, multum studiis auferunt, quid putamus facturas cupiditatem, avaritiam, invidiam? Nihil enim est tam occupatum, tam multiforme, tot ac tam variis affectibus concisum, atque laceratum, quam mala ac improba mens. Quis inter hæc, literis, aut ulli bonæ arti, locus? Non hercle magis quam frugibus, in terra sentibus ac rubis occupata.” *

But, besides this consideration, there is another of still higher importance, though I am not sure of its being attended to as much as it deserves; namely, that from the fountain of real and genuine virtue, are drawn those sentiments which will ever be most powerful in affecting the hearts of others. Bad as the world is, nothing has so great and universal a command over the minds of men as virtue. No kind of Language is so generally understood, and so powerfully felt, as the native Language of worthy and virtuous feelings. He only, therefore, who pos-esses these full and strong, can speak properly, and in its own language, to the heart. On all great subjects and occasions, there is a dignity; there is an energy in noble sentiments, which is overcoming and irresistible. They give an ardour and a flame to one's Discourse, which seldom fails to kindle a like flame in those who hear; and which, more than any other cause, bestows on Eloquence that power, for which it is famed, of seizing and transporting an Audience. Here, Art and Imitation will not avail. An assumed character conveys nothing of this powerful warmth. It is only a native and unaffected glow of feeling, which can transmit the emotion to others. Hence, the most renowned Orators, such as Cicero and Demosthenes, were no less distinguished for some of the high virtues, as public spirit and zeal for their country, than for Eloquence. Beyond doubt, to these virtues their Eloquence owed much of its effect; and those Orations of theirs, in which there breathes most of the virtuous and magnanimous spirit, are those which have most attracted the admiration of ages.

* “ If the management of an estate, if anxious attention to domestic œconomy, a passion for hunting, or whole days given up to public places of amusements, consume so much time that is due to study, how much greater waste must be occasioned by licentious desires, avarice, or envy? Nothing is so much hurried and agitated, so contradictory to itself, or so violently torn and shattered by conflicting passions, as a bad heart. Amidst the distractions which it produces, what room is left for the cultivation of letters, or the pursuit of any honourable art? No more, assuredly, than there is for the growth of corn in a field that is overrun with thorns and brambles.”

Nothing, therefore, is more necessary for those who would excel in any of the higher kinds of Oratory, than to cultivate habits of the several virtues, and to refine and improve all their moral feelings. Whenever these become dead, or callous, they may be assured, that, on every great occasion, they will speak with less power, and less success. The sentiments and dispositions particularly requisite for them to cultivate, are the following: The love of justice and order, and indignation at insolence and oppression; the love of honesty and truth, and detestation of fraud, meanness, and corruption; magnanimity of spirit; the love of liberty, of their country and the public; zeal for all great and noble designs, and reverence for all worthy and heroic characters. A cold and sceptical turn of mind is extremely adverse to Eloquence: and no less so, is that cavilling disposition which takes pleasure in depreciating what is great, and ridiculing what is generally admired. Such a disposition bespeaks one not very likely to excel in any thing; but least of all in Oratory. A true Orator should be a person of generous sentiments, of warm feelings, and of a mind turned towards the admiration of all those great and high objects, which mankind are naturally formed to admire. Joined with the manly virtues, he should, at the same time, possess strong and tender sensibility to all the injuries, distresses, and sorrows of his fellow-creatures; a heart that can easily relent; that can readily enter into the circumstances of others, and can make their case his own. A proper mixture of courage, and of modesty, must also be studied by every Public Speaker. Modesty is essential; it is always, and justly, supposed to be a concomitant of merit; and every appearance of it is winning and prepossessing. But modesty ought not to run into excessive timidity. Every Public Speaker should be able to rest somewhat on himself; and to assume that air, not of self-complacency, but of firmness, which bespeaks a consciousness of his being thoroughly persuaded of the truth, or justice, of what he delivers; a circumstance of no small consequence for making impression on those who hear.

Next to moral qualifications, what, in the second place, is most necessary to an Orator, is a fund of knowledge. Much is this inculcated by Cicero and Quintilian: "Quod omnibus disciplinis et artibus debet esse instructus Orator." By which they mean, that he ought to have, what we call, a Liberal Education; and to be formed by a regular study of philosophy, and the polite arts. We must never forget that,

Scribendi recte, sapere est & principium & fons.

Good sense and knowledge are the foundation of all good speaking. There is no art that can teach one to be eloquent, in any sphere, without a sufficient acquaintance with what belongs to that sphere; or if there were an art that made such pretensions, it would be mere quackery, like the pretensions of the Sophists of old, to teach their disciples to speak for and against every subject; and would be deservedly exploded by all wise men. Attention to Style, to Composition, and all the Arts of Speech, can only assist an Orator in setting off, to advantage, the stock of materials which he possesses; but the stock, the materials themselves, must be brought from other quarters than from Rhetoric. He who is to plead at the Bar, must make himself thoroughly master of the knowledge of the law; of all the learning and experience that can be useful in his profession, for supporting a cause, or convincing a judge. He who is to speak from the Pulpit, must apply himself closely to the study of divinity, of practical religion, of morals, of human nature; that he may be rich in all the topics, both of instruction and of persuasion. He who would fit himself for being a Member of the Supreme Council of the Nation, or of any Public Assembly, must be thoroughly acquainted with the business that belongs to such Assembly; he must study the forms of Court, the course of procedure; and must attend minutely to all the facts that may be the subject of question or deliberation.

Besides the knowledge that properly belongs to his profession, a Public Speaker, if ever he expects to be eminent, must make himself acquainted, as far as his necessary occupations allow, with the general circle of polite literature. The study of Poetry may be useful to him, on many occasions, for embellishing his Style, for suggesting lively images, or agreeable allusions. The study of History may be still more useful to him; as the knowledge of facts, of eminent characters, and of the course of human affairs, finds place on many occasions.* There are few great occasions of Public Speaking, in which one may not derive assistance from cultivated taste, and extensive knowledge, they will often yield him materials for proper ornament; sometimes, for argument and real use. A deficiency of knowledge, even in subjects that belong not directly to his own profession, will expose him to many disadvantages, and give better qualified rivals a great superiority over him.

Allow me to recommend in the third place, not only the attainment of useful knowledge, but a habit of application and industry. Without this, it is impossible to excel in any thing. We must not imagine, that it is by a sort of mushroom growth, that one can rise to be a distinguished Pleader, or Preacher, or Speaker in any Assembly. It is not by starts of application, or by a few years preparation of study afterwards discontinued, that eminence can be attained. No; it can be attained only by means of regular industry, grown up into a habit, and ready to be exerted on every occasion that calls for industry. This is the fixed law of our nature; and he must have a very high opinion of his own genius indeed, that can believe himself an exception to it. A very wise law of our nature it is; for industry is, in truth, the great "Condimentum," the seasoning of every pleasure; without which life is doomed to languish. Nothing is so great an enemy both to honourable attainments, and to the real, to the brisk, and spirited enjoyments of life, as that relaxed state of mind which arises from indolence and dissipation.

* “ Imprimis verò abundare debet Orator exemplorum copia, cum veterum, tum etiam novorum; adeo ut non modo quæ conscripta sunt historiis, aut Sermonibus velut per manus tradita, quæque quotidie aguntur, debeat nôsse; verùm ne ea quidem quæ a clarioribus poëtis sunt ficta negligere.”

One that is destined to excel in any art, especially in the arts of Speaking and Writing, will be known by this more than by any other mark whatever, and enthusiasm for that art; an enthusiasm, which, firing his mind with the object he has in view, will dispose him to relish every labour which the means require. It was this, that characterised the great men of antiquity; it is this, which must distinguish the Moderns who would tread in their steps. This honourable enthusiasm, it is highly necessary for such as are studying Oratory to cultivate. If youth wants it, manhood will flag miserably.

In the fourth place, Attention to the best models will contribute greatly towards improvement. Every one who speaks or writes, should, indeed endeavour to have somewhat that is his own, that is peculiar to himself, and that characterises his Composition and Style. Slavish Imitation depresses Genius, or rather betrays the want of it. But withal, there is no Genius so original; but may be profited and assisted by the aid of proper examples, in Style, Composition, and Delivery. They always open some new ideas; they serve to enlarge and correct our own. They quicken the current of thought, and excite emulation.

Much, indeed, will depend upon the right choice of models which we propose to imitate; and supposing them rightly chosen, a farther care is requisite, of not being seduced by a blind universal admiration. For, “decipit exemplar, vitiis imitabile.” Even in the most finished models we can select, it must not be forgotten, that there are always some things improper for imitation. We should study to acquire a just conception of the peculiar characteristic beauties of any Writer, or Public Speaker, and imitate these only. One ought never to attach himself too closely to any single model; for he who does so, is almost sure of being seduced into a faulty and affected imitation. His business should be, to draw from several the proper ideas of perfection. Living examples of Public Speaking, in any kind, it will not be expected that I should here point out. As to the Writers, ancient and modern, from whom benefit may be derived in forming Composition and Style, I have spoken so much of them in former Lectures, that it is needless to repeat what I have said of their virtues and defects. I own, it is to be regretted, that the English Language, in which there is much good writing, furnishes us, however, with but very few recorded examples of eloquent Public Speaking. Among the French there are more. Saurin, Bourdaloue, Flechier, Massillon, particularly the last, are eminent for the Eloquence of the Pulpit, But the most nervous and sublime of all their Orators is Bossuet, the famous Bishop of Meaux ; in whose Oraisons Funèbres, there is a very high spirit of Oratory.* Some of Fontenelle's Harangues to the French Academy, are elegant and agreeable. And at the Bar the printed pleadings of Cochin and D'Aguesseau, are highly extolled by the late French Critics.

There is one observation, which it is of importance to make, concerning imitation of the Style of any favourite Author, when we would carry his Style into Public Speaking. We must attend to a very material distinction between written and spoken language. These, are, in truth, two different manners of communicating ideas. A book that is to be read, requires one sort of Style ; a man that is to speak, must use another. In books, we look for correctness, precision, all redundancies pruned, all repetitions avoided, language completely polished. Speaking admits a more easy copious Style, and less fettered by rule ; repetitions may often be necessary, parenthesis may sometimes be graceful ; the same thought must often be placed in different views ; as the hearers can catch it only from the mouth of the Speaker, and have not the advantage, as in reading a book, of turning back again, and of dwelling on what they do not fully comprehend. Hence the Style of many good Authors would appear stiff, affected, and even obscure, if, by too close an imitation, we should transfer it to a Popular Oration. How awkward, for example, would Lord Shaftesbury's Sentences sound in the mouth of a Public Speaker? Some kinds of Public Discourse, it is true, such as that of the Pulpit, where more exact preparation and more studied Style are admitted, would bear such a manner better than others which are expected to approach more to extemporaneous speaking. But still there is, in general, so much difference between Speaking, and Composition designed only to be read, as should guard us against a close and injudicious imitation.

* The criticism which M. Crevier, Author of Rhetorique Française, passes upon these writers whom I have above named, is, "Bossuet est grande, mais inégal ; Flechier est plus égal, mais moins élevé, & souvent trop fleuri : Bourdaloue est solide & judicieux, mais il neglige les graces legères : Massillon est plus riche en images, mais moins fort en raisonnement. Je souhaite donc, que l'orateur ne se contente dans l'imitation d'un seul de ces modeles, mais qu'il tache de reunir en lui toutes leurs différentes vertus." Vol. II. chap. dernière.

Some Authors there are, whose manner of Writing approaches nearer to the Style of Speaking than others; and who, therefore, can be imitated with more safety. In this class, among the English Authors, are Dean Swift and Lord Bolingbroke. The Dean, throughout all his writings, in the midst of much correctness, maintains the easy natural manner of an unaffected Speaker; and this is one of his chief excellencies. Lord Bolingbroke's Style is more splendid, and more declamatory than Dean Swift's; but still it is the Style of one who speaks, or rather who harangues. Indeed, all his Political Writings (for it is to them only and not to his Philosophical ones, that this observation can be applied,) carry much more the appearance of one declaiming with warmth in a great assembly, than of one writing in a closet, in order to be read by others. They have all the copiousness, the fervour, the inculcating method that is allowable and graceful in an Orator; perhaps too much of it for a Writer; and it is to be regretted, as I have formerly observed, that the matter contained in them should have been so trivial, or so false: for, from the manner and style, considerable advantage might be reaped.

In the fifth place, Besides attention to the best models, frequent exercise both in composing and speaking, will be admitted to be a necessary mean of improvement. That sort of Composition is, doubtless, most useful, which relates to the profession, or kind of Public Speaking, to which persons addict themselves. This they should keep ever in their eye, and be gradually inuring themselves to it. But let me also advise them, not to allow themselves in negligent Composition of any kind. He who has it for his aim to write, or to speak correctly, should, in the most trivial kind of Composition, in writing a letter, nay, even in common discourse, study to acquit himself with propriety. I do not at all mean, that he is never to write or to speak a word, but in elaborate and artificial language. This would form him to a stiffness and affectation, worse, by ten thousand degrees, than the greatest negligence. But it is to be observed, that there is, in every thing, a manner which is becoming, and has propriety; and opposite to it, there is a clumsy and faulty performance of the same thing. The becoming manner is very often the most light, and seemingly careless manner: but it requires taste and attention to seize the just idea of it. That idea, when acquired, we should keep in our eye, and form upon it whatever we write or say.

Exercises of speaking have always been recommended to students, in order that they may prepare themselves for speaking in public, and on real business. The Meetings, or Societies, into which they sometimes form themselves for this purpose, are laudable institutions; and, under proper conduct, may serve many valuable purposes. They are favourable to knowledge and study, by giving occasion to enquiries concerning those subjects which are made the ground of discussion. They produce emulation; and gradually inure those who are concerned in them, to somewhat that resembles a Public Assembly. They accustom them to know their own powers, and to acquire a command of themselves in speaking; and what is, perhaps, the greatest advantage of all, they give them a facility and fluency of expression, and assist them in procuring that "Copia verborum," which can be acquired by no other means but frequent exercise in speaking.

But the Meetings which I have now in my eye, are to be understood of those academical associations, where a moderate number of young Gentlemen, who are carrying on their studies, and are connected by some affinity in the future pursuits which they have in view, assemble privately, in order to improve one another, and to prepare themselves for those public exhibitions which may afterwards fall to their lot. As for those public and promiscuous Societies, in which multitudes are brought together, who are often of low stations and occupations, who are joined by no common bond of union, except an absurd rage for Public Speaking, and have no other object in view, but to make a show of their supposed talents, they are institutions not merely of an useless, but of an hurtful nature, They are in great hazard of proving seminaries of licentiousness, petulance, faction, and folly. They mislead those, who, in their own callings, might be useful members of Society, into fantastic plans of making a figure on subjects which divert their attention from their proper business, and are widely remote from their sphere in life.

Even the allowable meetings into which Students of Oratory form themselves, stand in need of direction in order to render them useful. If their subjects of discourse be improperly chosen; if they maintain extravagant or indecent topics; if they indulge themselves in loose and flimsy declamation, which has no foundation in good sense; or accustom themselves to speak pertly on all subjects without due preparation, they may improve one another in petulance, but in no other thing; and will infallibly form themselves to a very faulty and vicious taste in speaking. I would, therefore, advise all who are members of such societies, in the first place, to attend to the choice of their subjects; that they be useful and manly, either formed on the course of their studies, or on something that has relation to morals and taste, to action and life. In the second place, I would advise them to be temperate in the practice of Speaking; not to speak too often, nor on subjects where they are ignorant or unripe; but only when they have proper materials for a discourse, and have digested and thought of the subject beforehand. In the third place, When they do speak, they should study always to keep good sense and persuasion in view, rather than an ostentation of Eloquence; and for this end, I would, in the fourth place, repeat the advice which I gave in a former Lecture, that they should always choose that side of the question to which, in their own judgment, they are most inclined, as the right and the true side; and defend it by such arguments as seem to them most solid. By these means they will take the best method of forming themselves gradually to a manly, correct, and persuasive manner of Speaking.

It now only remains to inquire, of what use may the study of Critical and Rhetorical Writers be for improving one in the practice of Eloquence? These are certainly not to be neglected; and yet, I dare not say that much is to be expected from them. For professed Writers on Public Speaking, we must look chiefly among the Ancients. In modern times, for reasons which were before given, Popular Eloquence, as an Art, has never been very much the object of study; it has not the same powerful effects among us that it had in more democratical states; and therefore has not been cultivated with the same care. Among the Moderns, though there has been a great deal of good criticism on the different kinds of Writing, yet much has not been attempted on the subject of Eloquence or Public Discourse; and what has been given us of that kind, has been drawn mostly from the Ancients. Such a Writer as Joannes Gerardus Vossius, who has gathered into one heap of ponderous lumber, all the trifling, as well as the useful things, that are to be found in the Greek and Roman Writers, is enough to disgust one with the study of Eloquence. Among the French, there has been more attempted on this subject, than among the English. The Bishop of Cambray's Writings on Eloquence I before mentioned with honour. Rollin, Batteux, Crevier, Gibert, and several other French Critics, have also written on Oratory; but though some of them may be useful, none of them are so considerable as to deserve particular recommendation.

It is to the original Ancient Writers that we must chiefly have recourse; and it is a reproach to any one, whose profession calls him to speak in public, to be unacquainted with them. In all the Ancient Rhetorical Writers, there is, indeed, this defect, that they are too systematical, as I formerly shewed; they aim at doing too much; at reducing Rhetoric to a complete and perfect Art, which may even supply invention with materials on every subject; insomuch, that one would imagine they expected to form an Orator by rule, in as mechanical a manner as one would form a Carpenter. Whereas, all that can, in truth, be done, is to give openings for assisting and enlightening Taste, and for pointing out to Genius the course it ought to hold.

Aristotle laid the foundation for all that was afterwards written on the subject. That amazing and comprehensive Genius, which does honour to human nature, and which gave light into so many different Sciences, has investigated the principles of Rhetoric with great penetration. Aristotle appears to have been the first who took Rhetoric out of the hands of the Sophists, and introduced reasoning and good sense into the Art. Some of the profoundest things which have been written on the passions and manners of men, are to be found in his Treatise on Rhetoric; though in this, as in all his writings, his great brevity often renders him obscure. Succeeding Greek Rhetoricians, most of whom are now lost, improved on the foundation which Aristotle had laid. Two of them still remain, Demetrius Phalereus, and Dionysius of Halicarnassus; both write on the Construction of Sentences, and deserve to be perused; especially Dionysius, who is a very accurate and judicious Critic.

I need scarcely recommend the rhetorical writings of Cicero. Whatever, on the subject of Eloquence, comes from so great an Orator, must be worthy of attention. His most considerable work on this subject is that De Oratore, in three books. None of Cicero's writings are more highly finished than this Treatise. The dialogue is polite; the characters are well supported, and the conduct of the whole is beautiful and agreeable. It is, indeed, full of digressions, and his rules and observations may be thought sometimes too vague and general. Useful things, however, may be learned from it; and it is no small benefit to be made acquainted with Cicero's own idea of Eloquence. The "Orator ad M. Brutum," is also a considerable Treatise; and, in general, throughout all Cicero's rhetorical works there runs those high and sublime ideas of Eloquence, which are fitted both for forming a just taste, and for creating that enthusiasm for the Art, which is of the greatest consequence for excelling in it.

But of all the Ancient Writers on the subject of Oratory, the most instructive, and most useful, is Quintilian. I know few books which abound more with good sense, and discover a greater degree of just and accurate taste, than Quintilian's Institutions. Almost all the principles of good Criticism are to be found in them. He has digested into excellent order all the ancient ideas concerning Rhetoric, and is, at the same time, himself an eloquent Writer. Though some parts of his work contain too much of the technical and artificial system then in vogue, and for that reason may be thought dry and tedious, yet I would not advise the omitting to read any part of his Institutions. To Pleaders at the Bar, even these technical parts may prove of some use. Seldom has any person, of more sound and distinct judgment than Quintilian, applied himself to the study of the Art of Oratory.

LECTURE XXXV.

COMPARATIVE MERIT OF THE ANCIENTS AND THE MODERNS—HISTORICAL WRITING.

I HAVE now finished that part of the Course which respected Oratory or Public Speaking, and which, as far as the subject allowed, I have endeavoured to form into some sort of system. It remains, that I enter on the consideration of the most distinguished kinds of Composition both in Prose and Verse; and point out the principles of Criticism relating to them. This part of the work might easily be drawn out to a great length; but I am sensible that critical discussions, when they are pursued too far, become both trifling and tedious. I shall study, therefore, to avoid unnecessary prolixity; and hope, at the same time, to omit nothing that is very material under the several heads.

I shall follow the same method here which I have all along pursued, and without which these Lectures could not be entitled to any attention; that is, I shall freely deliver my own opinion on every subject; regarding authority no farther, than as it appears to me founded on good sense and reason. In former Lectures, as I have often quoted several of the ancient Classics for their beauties, so I have also, sometimes, pointed out their defects. Hereafter, I shall have occasion to do the same, when treating of their writings under more general heads. It may be fit, therefore, that, before I proceed farther, I make some observations on the comparative merit of the Ancients and the Moderns; in order that we may be able to ascertain, rationally, upon what foundation that deference rests, which has so generally been paid to the Ancients. These observations are the more necessary, as this subject has given rise to no small controversy in the Republic of Letters; and they may, with propriety, be made now, as they will serve to throw light on some things I have afterwards to deliver, concerning different kinds of Composition.

It is a remarkable phænomenon, and one which has often employed the speculations of curious men, that Writers and Artists, most distinguished for their parts and genius, have generally appeared in considerable numbers at a time. Some ages have been remarkably barren in them; while, at other periods, Nature seems to have exerted herself with a more than ordinary effort, and to have poured them forth with a profuse fertility. Various reasons have been assigned for this. Some of the moral causes lie obvious; such as favourable circumstances of government and of manners; encouragement from great men; emulation excited among the men of genius. But as these have been thought inadequate to the whole effect, physical causes have been also assigned; and the Abbé du Bos, in his Reflections on Poetry and Painting, has collected a great many observations on the influence which the air, the climate, and other such natural causes, may be supposed to have upon genius. But whatever the causes be, the fact is certain, that there have been certain periods or ages of the world much more distinguished than others for the extraordinary productions of genius.

Learned men have marked out four of these happy ages. The first is the Grecian Age, which commenced near the time of the Peloponnesian war, and extended till the time of Alexander the Great; within which period we have Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Demosthenes, Æschines, Lysias, Isocrates, Pindar, Æschylus, Euripides, Sophocles, Aristophanes, Menander, Anacreon, Theocritus, Lysippus, Apelles, Phidias, Praxiteles. The second is the Roman Age, included nearly within the days of Julius Cæsar and Augustus; affording us Catullus, Lucretius, Terence, Virgil, Horace, Tibullus, Propertius, Ovid, Phædrus, Cæsar, Cicero, Livy, Sallust, Varro, and Vitruvius. The third Age is, that of the restoration of Learning; under the Popes Julius II. and Leo X.; when flourished Ariosto, Tasso, Sannazarius, Vida, Machiavel, Guicciardini, Davila, Erasmus, Paul Jovius, Michael Angelo, Raphael, Titian. The fourth comprehends the Age of Louis XIV. and Queen Anne; when flourished in France, Corneille, Racine, De Retz, Moliere, Boileau, Fontaine, Baptiste, Rousseau, Bössuet, Fenelon, Bourdaloue, Pascall, Malebranche, Massillon, Bruyere, Bayle, Fontenelle, Vertot; and in England, Dryden, Pope, Addison, Prior, Swift, Parnell, Arbuthnot, Congreve, Otway, Young, Rowe, Atterbury, Shaftesbury, Bolingbroke, Tillotson, Temple, Boyle, Locke, Newton, Clarke.

When we speak comparatively of the Ancients and the Moderns, we generally mean by the Ancients, such as lived in the two first of these periods, including also one or two who lived more early, as Homer in particular; and by the Moderns, those who flourished in the two last of these ages, including also the eminent Writers down to our own times. Any comparison between these two classes of Writers must necessarily be vague and loose, as they comprehend so many, and of such different kinds and degrees of genius. But the comparison is generally made to turn, by those who are fond of making it, upon two or three of the most distinguished in each class. With much heat it was agitated in France, between Boileau and Mad. Dacier, on the one hand, for the Ancients, and Perault and La Motte, on the other, for the Moderns; and it was carried to extremes on both sides. To this day, among men of taste and letters, we find a leaning to one or other side. A few reflections may throw light upon the subject, and enable us to discern upon what grounds we are to rest our judgment in this controversy.

If any one, at this day, in the eighteenth century, takes upon him to decry the ancient Classics; if he pretends to have discovered that Homer and Virgil are Poets of inconsiderable merit, and that Demosthenes and Cicero are not great Orators, we may boldly venture to tell such a man, that he is come too late with his discovery. The reputation of such Writers is established upon a foundation too solid to be now shaken by any arguments whatever; for it is established upon the almost universal taste of mankind, proved and tried throughout the succession of so many ages. Imperfections in their works he may, indeed, point out; passages that are faulty he may shew; for where is the human work that is perfect? But, if he attempts to discredit their works in general, or to prove that the reputation which they have gained is, on the whole, unjust, there is an argument against him, which is equal to full demonstration. He must be in the wrong; for human nature is against him. In matters of taste, such as Poetry and Oratory, to whom does the appeal lie? where is the standard? and where the authority of the last decision? where is it to be looked for, but, as I formerly shewed, in those feelings and sentiments that are found, on the most extensive examination, to be the common sentiments and feelings of men? These have been fully consulted on this head. The Public, the unprejudiced Public, has been tried and appealed to for many centuries, and throughout almost all civilized nations. It has pronounced its verdict; it has given its sanction to these writers; and from this tribunal there lies no farther appeal.

In matters of mere reasoning, the world may be long in an error; and may be convinced of the error by stronger reasonings, when produced. Positions that depend upon science, upon knowledge, and matters of fact, may be overturned according as science and knowledge are enlarged, and new matters of fact are brought to light. For this reason, a system of Philosophy receives no sufficient sanction from its antiquity, or long currency. The world, as it grows older, may be justly expected to become, if not wiser, at least more knowing; and supposing it doubtful, whether Aristotle or Newton were the greater genius, yet Newton's Philosophy may prevail over Aristotle's by means of later discoveries, to which Aristotle was a stranger. But nothing of this kind holds as to matters of Taste; which depend not on the progress of knowledge and science, but upon sentiment and feeling. It is in vain to think of undeceiving mankind, with respect to errors committed here, as in Philosophy. For the universal feeling of mankind is the natural feeling; and because it is the natural, it is, for that reason, the right feeling. The reputation of the Iliad and the Æneid must therefore stand upon sure ground, because it has stood so long; though that of the Aristotelian or Platonic Philosophy, every one is at liberty to call in question.

It is in vain also to allege, that the reputation of the ancient Poets and Orators is owing to authority, to pedantry, and to the prejudices of education, transmitted from age to age. These, it is true, are the authors put into our hands at schools and colleges, and by that means we have now an early prepossession in their favour; but how came they to gain the possession of colleges and schools? Plainly, by the high fame which these authors had among their own contemporaries. For the Greek and Latin were not always dead Languages. There was a time when Homer, and Virgil, and Horace, were viewed in the same light as we now view Dryden, Pope, and Addison. It is not to commentators and universities that the classics are indebted for their fame. They became classics and school-books, in consequence of the high admiration which was paid them by the best judges in their own country and nation. As early as the days of Juvenal, who wrote under the reign of Domitian, we find Virgil and Horace become the standard books in the education of youth.

Quot stabant pueri, cum totus decolor esset
Flaccus, & hæreret nigro fuligo Maroni.* SAT. 7.

From this general principle, then, of the reputation of the great ancient Classics being so early, so lasting, so extensive, among all the most polished nations, we may justly and boldly infer, that their reputation cannot be wholly unjust, but must have a solid foundation in the merit of their writings.

Let us guard, however, against a blind and implicit veneration for the Ancients in every thing. I have opened the general principle which must go far in instituting a fair comparison between them and the Moderns. Whatever superiority the Ancients may have had in point of genius, yet in all arts, where the natural progress of knowledge has had room to produce any considerable effects, the Moderns cannot but have some advantage. The world may, in certain respects, be considered as a person, who must needs gain somewhat by advancing in years. Its improvements have not, I confess, been always in

* "Then thou art bound to smell, on either hand,
"As many stinking lamps, as school-boys stand,
"When Horace could not read in his own sully'd book,
"And Virgil's sacred page was all besmear'd with smoke."

proportion to the centuries that have passed over it; for, during the course of some ages, it has sunk as into a total lethargy. Yet, when roused from that lethargy, it has generally been able to avail itself, more or less, of former discoveries. At intervals, there arose some happy genius, who could both improve on what had gone before, and invent something new. With the advantage of a proper stock of materials, an inferior genius can make greater progress than a much superior one, to whom these materials are wanting.

Hence, in Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, Chemistry, and other Sciences that depend on an extensive knowledge and observation of facts, Modern Philosophers have an unquestionable superiority over the Ancient. I am inclined also to think, that in matters of pure reasoning, there is more precision among the Moderns, than in some instances there was among the Ancients; owing perhaps to a more extensive literary intercourse, which has improved and sharpened the faculties of men. In some studies, too, that relate to taste and fine writing, which is our object, the progress of Society must, in equity, be admitted to have given us some advantages. For instance, in History, there is certainly more political knowledge in several European nations at present than there was in ancient Greece and Rome. We are better acquainted with the nature of government, because we have seen it under a greater variety of forms and revolutions. The world is more laid open than it was in former times; commerce is greatly enlarged; more countries are civilized; posts are every where established; intercourse is become more easy; and the knowledge of facts, by consequence, more attainable. All these are great advantages to Historians; of which, in some measure, as I shall afterwards show, they have availed themselves. In the more complex kinds of Poetry, likewise, we may have gained somewhat, perhaps, in point of regularity and accuracy. In Dramatic Performances, having the advantage of the ancient models, we may be allowed to have made some improvements in the variety of the characters, the conduct of the plot, attentions to probability, and to decorums.

These seem to me the chief points of superiority we can plead above the Ancients. Neither do they extend as far as might be imagined at first view. For if the strength of genius be on one side, it will go far, in works of taste at least, to counterbalance all the artificial improvements which can be made by greater knowledge and correctness. To return to our comparison of the age of the world with that of a man; it may be said, not altogether without reason, that if the advancing age of the world bring along with it more science and more refinement, there belong, however, to its earlier periods, more vigour, more fire, more enthusiasm of genius. This appears indeed to form the characteristic difference between the Ancient Poets, Orators, and Historians, compared with the Modern. Among the Ancients, we find higher conceptions, greater simplicity, more original fancy. Among the Moderns, sometimes more art and correctness, but feebler exertions of genius. But though this be in general a mark of distinction between the Ancients and Moderns, yet, like all general observations, it must be understood with some exceptions; for, in point of poetical fire and original genius, Milton and Shakespeare are inferior to no Poets in any age.

It is proper to observe, that there were some circumstances in ancient times very favourable to those uncommon efforts of genius which were then exerted. Learning was a much more rare and singular attainment in the earlier ages, than it is at present. It was not to schools and universities that the persons applied who sought to distinguish themselves. They had not this easy recourse. They travelled for their improvement into distant countries, to Egypt, and to the East. They inquired after all the monuments of learning there. They conversed with Priests, Philosophers, Poets, with all who had acquired any distinguished fame. They returned to their own country full of the discoveries which they had made, and fired by the new and uncommon objects which they had seen. Their knowledge and improvements cost them more labour, raised in them more enthusiasm, were attended with higher rewards and honours, than in modern days. Fewer had the means and opportunities of distinguishing themselves; but such as did distinguish themselves, were sure of acquiring that fame, and even veneration, which is, of all rewards, the greatest incentive to genius. Herodotus read his history to all Greece assembled at the Olympic games, and was publicly crowned. In the Peloponnesian war, when the Athenian army was defeated in Sicily, and the prisoners were ordered to be put to death, such of them as could repeat any verses of Euripides were saved, from honour to that Poet, who was a citizen of Athens. These were testimonies of public regard, far beyond what modern manners confer upon genius.

In our times, good writing is considered as an attainment, neither so difficult nor so high and meritorious.

Scribimus indocti, doctique, Poëmata passim. *

We write much more supinely, and at our ease, than the Ancients. To excel, is become a much less considerable object. Less effort, less exertion is required, because we have many more assistances than they. Printing has rendered all books common, and easy to be had. Education for any of the learned professions can be carried on without much trouble. Hence a mediocrity of genius is spread over all; but to rise beyond that, and to overtop the crowd, is given to few. The multitude of assistances which we have for all kinds of composition, in the opinion of Sir William Temple, a very competent judge, rather depresses than favours the exertions of native genius. "It is very possible," says that ingenious Author, in his Essay on the Ancients and Moderns, "that men may lose rather than gain by these; may lessen the force of their own genius, by forming it upon that of others; may have less knowledge of their own, for contenting themselves with that of those before them. So a man that only translates, shall never be a Poet; so people that trust to others charity, rather than their own industry, will be always poor. Who can tell," he adds, "whether learning may not even weaken invention, in a man that has great advantages from nature? Whether the weight and number of so many other men's thoughts and notions may not

* "Now every desperate blockhead dares to write,

"Verse is the trade of every living wight."

FRANCIS.

“ suppress his own ; as heaping on wood sometimes “ suppresses a little spark, that would otherwise “ have grown into a flame? The strength of mind,
“ as well as of body, grows more from the warmth “ of exercise, than of clothes ; nay, too much of this “ foreign heat, rather makes men faint, and their “ constitutions weaker than they would be without “ them.”

From whatever cause it happens, so it is, that among some of the Ancient Writers, we must look for the highest models in most of the kinds of elegant Composition. For accurate thinking and enlarged ideas, in several parts of Philosophy, to the Moderns we ought chiefly to have recourse. Of correct and finished writing in some works of taste, they may afford useful patterns ; but for all that belongs to original genius, to spirited, masterly, and high execution, our best and most happy ideas are, generally speaking, drawn from the Ancients. In Epic Poetry, for instance, Homer and Virgil, to this day, stand not within many degrees of any rival. Orators, such as Cicero and Demosthenes, we have none. In History, notwithstanding some defects, which I am afterwards to mention in the Ancient Historical Plans, it may be safely asserted, that we have no such historical narration, so elegant, so picturesque, so animated and interesting, as that of Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Livy, Tacitus, and Sallust. Although the conduct of the drama may be admitted to have received some improvements, yet for Poetry and Sentiment we have nothing to equal Sophocles and Euripides ; nor any dialogue in comedy, that comes up to the correct, graceful, and elegant simplicity of Terence. We have no such Love Elegies as those of Tibullus; no such Pastorals as some of Theocritus's: and for Lyric Poetry, Horace stands quite unrivalled. The name of Horace cannot be mentioned without a particular encomium. That "Curiosa Felicitas," which Petronius has remarked in his expression; the sweetness, elegance, and spirit of many of his Odes, the thorough knowledge of the world, the excellent sentiments, and natural easy manner which distinguish his Satires and Epistles, all contribute to render him one of those very few Authors whom one never tires of reading; and from whom alone, were every other monument destroyed, we should be led to form a very high idea of the taste and genius of the Augustan Age.

To all such, then, as wish to form their taste, and nourish their genius, let me warmly recommend the assiduous study of the Ancient Classics, both Greek and Roman:

Nocturnâ versate manu, versate diurnâ.*

Without a considerable acquaintance with them, no man can be reckoned a polite scholar, and he will want many assistances for writing and speaking well, which the knowledge of such Authors would afford him. Any one has great reason to suspect his own taste, who receives little or no pleasure from the perusal of Writings, which so many ages and nations have consented in holding up as objects of admiration. And I am persuaded it will be found, that in proportion as the Ancients are generally studied and admired, or are unknown and disregarded in any country, good taste and good composition will flourish or decline. They are commonly none but the ignorant or superficial who undervalue them.

* "Read them by day, and study them by night."

At the same time, a just and high regard for the prime writers of antiquity is to be always distinguished, from that contempt of every thing which is Modern, and that blind veneration for all that has been written in Greek or Latin, which belongs only to pedants. Among the Greek and Roman Authors, some assuredly deserve much higher regard than others; nay, some are of no great value. Even the best of them lie open occasionally to just censure; for to no human performance is it given to be absolutely perfect. We may, we ought therefore to read them with a distinguishing eye, so as to propose for imitation their beauties only; and it is perfectly consistent with just and candid criticism, to find fault with parts, while at the same time, it admires the whole.

After these reflections on the Ancients and Moderns, I proceed to a critical examination of the most distinguished kinds of Composition, and the characters of those Writers who have excelled in them whether Modern or Ancient.

The most general division of the different kinds of Composition is, into those written in Prose, and those written in Verse; which certainly require to be separately considered, because subject to separate laws. I begin, as is most natural, with Writings in Prose. Of Orations, or public Discourses of all kinds, I have already treated fully. The remaining species of Prose Compositions, which assume any such regular form as to fall under the cognizance of criticism, seem to be chiefly these: Historical Writing, Philosophical Writing, Epistolary Writing, and Fictitious History. Historical Composition shall be first considered; and, as it is an object of dignity, I propose to treat of it at some length.

As it is the office of an Orator to persuade, it is that of an Historian to record truth for the instruction of mankind. This is the proper object and end of history, from which may be deduced many of the laws relating to it; and if this object were always kept in view, it would prevent many of the errors into which persons are apt to fall concerning this species of composition. As the primary end of history is to record truth, Impartiality, Fidelity, and Accuracy, are the fundamental qualities of an Historian. He must neither be a panegyrist nor a satirist. He must not enter into faction, nor give scope to affection; but, contemplating past events and characters with a cool and dispassionate eye, must present to his Readers a faithful copy of human nature.

At the same time, it is not every record of facts, however true, that is entitled to the name of History; but such a record as enables us to apply the transactions of former ages for our own instruction. The facts ought to be momentous and important; represented in connection with their causes; traced to their effects; and unfolded in clear and distinct order. For wisdom is the great end of History. It is designed to supply the want of experience. Though it enforce not its instructions with the same authority, yet it furnishes us with a greater variety of instructions, than it is possible for experience to afford in the course of the longest life. Its object is, to enlarge our views of the human character, and to give full exercise to our judgment on human affairs. It must not therefore be a tale calculated to please only; and addressed to the fancy. Gravity and dignity are essential characteristics of History; no light ornaments are to be employed, no flippancy of style, no quaintness of wit. But the Writer must sustain the character of a wise man, writing for the instruction of posterity; one who has studied to inform himself well, who has pondered his subject with care, and addresses himself to our judgment, rather than to our imagination. At the same time, Historical Writing is by no means inconsistent with ornamented and spirited narration. It admits of much high ornament and elegance; but the ornaments must be always consistent with dignity; they should not appear to be sought after, but to rise naturally from a mind animated by the events which it records.

Historical Composition is understood to comprehend under it, Annals, Memoirs, Lives. But these are its inferior subordinate species, on which I shall hereafter make some reflections, when I shall have first considered what belongs to a regular and legitimate work of History. Such a work is chiefly of two kinds. Either the entire History of some state or kingdom through its different revolutions, such as Livy's Roman History; or the History of some one great event, or some portion or period of time which may be considered as making a whole by itself; such as Thucydides's History of the Peloponnesian War, Davila's History of the Civil Wars of France, or Clarendon's of those of England.

In the conduct and management of his subject, the first attention requisite in an Historian, is to give it as much unity as possible; that is, his History.

should not consist of separate unconnected parts merely, but should be bound together by some connecting principle, which shall make the impression on the mind of something that is one, whole and entire. It is inconceivable how great an effect this, when happily executed, has upon a Reader, and it is surprising that some able Writers of History have not attended to it more. Whether pleasure or instruction be the end sought by the study of History, either of them is enjoyed to much greater advantage, when the mind has always before it the progress of some one great plan or system of actions; when there is some point or centre, to which we can refer the various facts related by the Historian.

In general Histories, which record the affairs of a whole nation or empire throughout several ages, this unity, I confess, must be more imperfect. Yet even there, some degree of it can be preserved by a skilful Writer. For though the whole, taken together, be very complex, yet the great constituent parts of it form so many subordinate wholes, when taken by themselves; each of which can be treated both as complete within itself, and as connected with what goes before and follows. In the History of a Monarch, for instance, every reign should have its own unity; a beginning, a middle, and an end, to the system of affairs; while, at the same time, we are taught to discern how that system of affairs rose from the preceding, and how it is inserted into what follows. We should be able to trace all the secret links of the chain, which binds together remote and seemingly unconnected events. In some kingdoms of Europe, it was the plan of many successive Princes to reduce the power of their Nobles; and during several reigns, most of the leading actions had a reference to this end. In other states, the rising power of the Commons influenced, for a tract of time, the course and connection of public affairs. Among the Romans, the leading principle was a gradual extension of conquest, and the attainment of universal empire. The continual increase of their power, advancing towards this end from small beginnings, and by a sort of regular progressive plan, furnished to Livy a happy subject for historical unity, in the midst of a great variety of transactions.

Of all the ancient general historians, the one who had the most exact idea of this quality of Historical Composition, though in other respects not an elegant Writer, is Polybius. This appears from the account he gives of his own plan in the beginning of his third book; observing that the subject of which he had undertaken to write, is, throughout the whole of it, one action, one great spectacle; how, and by what causes, all the parts of the habitable world became subject to the Roman empire. "This action," says he, "is distinct in its beginning, determined in its duration, and clear in its final accomplishment; therefore, I think it of use to give a general view beforehand of the chief constituent parts which make up this whole." In another place, he congratulates himself on his good fortune, in having a subject for History which allowed such variety of parts to be united under one view; remarking, that before this period the affairs of the world were scattered and without connection; whereas, in the times of which he writes, all the great transactions of the world tended and verged to one point, and were capable of being considered as parts of one system.

Whereupon he adds several very judicious observations concerning the usefulness of writing History upon such a comprehensive and connected plan; comparing the imperfect degree of knowledge which is afforded by particular facts without general views, to the imperfect idea which one would entertain of an animal who had beheld its separate parts only, without having ever seen its entire form and structure.*

Such as write the history of some particular great transaction, as confine themselves to one æra, or one portion of the history of a nation, have so great advantages for preserving historical unity, that they are inexcusable if they fail in it. Sallust's Histories of the Catilinarian and Jugurthine wars, Xenophon's Cyropædia, and his Retreat of the Ten Thousand, are instances of particular Histories, where the unity of historical object is perfectly well maintained. Thucydides, otherwise a writer of great strength and dignity, has failed much, in this article, in his history of the Peloponnesian war. No one great object is properly pursued, and kept in view; but his narration is cut down into small pieces, his history is divided by summers and winters, and we are every now and then leaving transactions unfinished, and are hurried from place to place, from Athens to Sicily, from thence to Peloponnesus, to Corcyra, to Mitylene, that we may be told of what is going on in all these places. We have a great many disjointed parts, and scattered limbs, which with difficulty we collect into one body; and through this faulty distribution and management of his subject, that judicious Historian becomes more tiresome, and less agreeable than he would otherwise be. For these reasons he is severely censured by one of the best Critics of antiquity, Dionysius of Halicarnassus.*

* Καθότι μὲν γὰρ ἔμοιγε δοκοῦσιν οἱ πεπεισμένοι διὰ τῆς κατα μέρος ἱστορίας μετρίως συνόψισθαι τὰ ὅλα, παραπλήσιον τι πάσχειν, ὡς ἂν ἔτινεις ἐμφύχῃ καὶ καλῶ σώματος γεγονότος διετρεμένα τα μέρη θεώμενοι, νομίζοιεν ἰκανῶς αὐτόπται γινεσθαι τῆς ἐνεργείας αὐτοῦ τῆ ζώου καὶ καλλοπῆς εἰ γὰρ τις αὐτίκα μαλα συνθεῖς καὶ τέλειον αὐτῆς ἀπεργασαμένος το ζῶον, τῷ τε εἶδει δε τῆ πῆς ψυχῆς εὐπρεπεία, κάπειτα πάλιν ἐπιδείκνυσι τοῖς αὐτοῖς ἐκείνοις, ταχέως ἂν οἶμαι πάντας αὐτοὺς ὁμολογήσειεν διο τι καὶ λίαν πολὺ τι τῆς ἀληθείας ἀπελείποντο προσθεῖν, καὶ παραπλήσιον τοῖς διειργώτεροις ἦσαν. ἔνοιαν μὲν γὰρ λαβεῖν ἀπο μέρους τῶν ὅλων δυνατὸν. ἐπιστήμην δὲ καὶ γνάμην ἀτρεκῆ ἔχειν ἀδύνατον. διο πανελῶς βραχυ τι νομισέον συμβαλλεσθαι τὴν κατα μέρος ἱστορίαν πρὸς τὴν τῶν ὅλων ἐμπειρίαν καὶ πίσιν, ἐκ μὲν τοιγε τῆς ἀπαντων πρὸς ἄλληλα συμπλοκῆς καὶ παραθέσεως, ἐτι δ' ὁμοιότητος καὶ διαφορᾶς μόνως ἂν τις ἐφίλοισο καὶ δυναθεῖη κατοπλευσας ἄμα καὶ το χρησίμην καὶ το τεργνόν, ἐκ τῆς ἱστορίας λαβεῖν.

* The censure which Dionysius passes upon Thucydides, is in several articles carried too far. He blames him for the choice of his subject, as not sufficiently splendid and agreeable, and as abounding too much in crimes and melancholy events, on which he observes that Thucydides loves to dwell. He is partial to Herodotus, whom, both for the choice and the conduct of his subject, he prefers to the other Historian. It is true, that the subject of Thucydides wants the gaiety and splendour of that of Herodotus; but it is not deficient in dignity. The Peloponnesian war was the contest between two great rival powers, the Athenian and Lacedemonian states, for the empire of Greece. Herodotus loves to dwell on prosperous incidents, and retains somewhat of the amusing manner of the ancient poetical historians. But Herodotus wrote to the Imagination, Thucydides writes to the Understanding. He was a grave reflecting man, well acquainted with human life; and the melancholy events and catastrophes, which he records, are often both the most interesting parts of history, and the most improving to the heart.

The Critic's observations on the faulty distribution which Thucydides makes of his subject, are better founded, and his preference of Herodotus, in this respect, is not unjust —

The Historian must not indeed neglect chronological order, with a view to render his narration agreeable. He must give a distinct account of the dates and of the coincidence of facts. But he is not under the necessity of breaking off always in the middle of transactions, in order to inform us of what was happening elsewhere at the same time. He discovers no art, if he cannot form some connection among the affairs which he relates, so as to introduce them in a proper train. He will soon tire the reader, if he goes on recording, in strict chronological order, a multitude of separate transactions, connected by nothing else, but their happening at the same time.

Though the history of Herodotus be of greater compass than that of Thucydides, and comprehend a much greater variety of dissimilar parts, he has been more fortunate in joining them together, and digesting them into order. Hence he is a more pleasing writer, and gives a stronger impression of his subject; though, in judgment and accuracy, much inferior to Thucydides. With digressions and episodes he abounds; but when these have any connection with the main subject, and are inserted professedly as episodes, the unity of the whole is less violated by them, than by a broken and scattered narration of the principal story. Among the Moderns, the President Thuanus has, by attempting to make the history of his own times too comprehensive, fallen into the same error, of loading the Reader with a great variety of unconnected facts, going on together in different parts of the world; an Historian otherwise of great probity, candour, and excellent understanding; but through this want of unity, more tedious, and less interesting than he would otherwise have been.

Θηκυδίδης μὲν τοῖς χρόνοις ἀκόλουθον, Ἡρόδοτος δὲ ταῖς περιόχαις τῶν πραγμάτων, γίγνεται Θηκυδίδης ἀσαφὴς καὶ δυσπαρακολούθητος· πολλὰ γὰρ κατὰ τὸ αὐτὸ θερὸς καὶ χειμῶνα γιγνόμενων ἐν διαφοραῖς τοποῖς, ἴμπεδεις τὰς πρώτας ῥαξίεις καταλιπὼν, ἑτέρων ἀπτεται τῶν κατὰ τὸ αὐτὸ θερὸς καὶ χειμῶνα γιγνόμενων· πλανώμεθα δὴ καθάπερ εἰκός, καὶ δυσκόλως τοῖς δηλωμένοις παρακολουθεῖμεν. Συμβίβηκε Θηκυδίδῃ μίαν ὑπόθεσιν λαβόντι πολλὰ ποιῆσαι μέρη τοῦ ἐν σώματι. Πηροδοτῷ δὲ τὰς πολλὰς καὶ ἕδεν ἐνοκίας ὑποθεσεῖς προεπιλομένῳ, συμφωνοῦν ἐν σώματι πέποιθεναι. With regard to Style, Dionysius gives Thucydides the just praise of energy and brevity; but censures him on many occasions, not without reason, for harsh and obscure expression, deficient in smoothness and ease.

LECTURE XXXVI.

HISTORICAL WRITING.

AFTER making some observations on the controversy which has been often carried on concerning the comparative merit of the Ancients and the Moderns, I entered, in the last Lecture, on the consideration of Historical Writing. The general idea of History is, a record of truth for the instruction of mankind. Hence arise the primary qualities required in a good Historian, impartiality, fidelity, gravity, and dignity. What I principally considered, was the unity which belongs to this sort of Composition ; the nature of which I have endeavoured to explain.

I proceed next to observe, that in order to fulfil the end of History, the Author must study to trace to their springs the actions and events which he records. Two things are especially necessary for his doing this successfully ; a thorough acquaintance with human nature, and political knowledge, or acquaintance with government. The former is necessary to account for the conduct of individuals, and to give just views of their character ; the latter to account for the revolutions of government, and the operation of political causes on public affairs. Both must concur, in order to form a completely instructive Historian.

With regard to the latter article, Political Knowledge, the ancient Writers wanted some advantages which the Moderns enjoy ; from whom, upon that account, we have a title to expect more accurate and precise information. The world, as I formerly hinted, was more shut up in ancient times, than it is now ; there was then less communication among neighbouring states ; and by consequence less knowledge of one another's affairs ; no intercourse by established posts, or by Ambassadors resident at distant courts. The knowledge, and materials of the ancient Historians, were thereby more limited and circumscribed ; and it is to be observed too, that they wrote for their own countrymen only ; they had no idea of writing for the instruction of foreigners, whom they despised, or of the world in general ; and hence they are less attentive to convey all that knowledge with regard to domestic policy, which we, in distant times, would desire to have learned from them. Perhaps, also, though in ancient ages men were abundantly animated with the love of liberty, yet the full extent of the influence of government, and of political causes, was not then so thoroughly scrutinized, as it has been in modern times; when a long experience of all the different modes of government has rendered men more enlightened and intelligent, with respect to public affairs.

To these reasons it is owing, that though the ancient Historians set before us the particular facts which they relate, in a very distinct and beautiful manner, yet sometimes they do not give us a clear view of all the political causes, which affected the situation of affairs of which they treat. From the Greek Historians, we are able to form but an imperfect notion of the strength, the wealth, and the revenues of the different Grecian states; of the causes of several of those revolutions that happened in their government; or of their separate connections and interfering interests. In writing the History of the Romans, Livy had surely the most ample field for displaying political knowledge, concerning the rise of their greatness, and the advantages or defects of their government. Yet the instruction in these important articles, which he affords, is not considerable. An elegant Writer he is, and a beautiful relater of facts, if ever there was one; but by no means distinguished for profoundness or penetration. Sallust, when writing the history of a conspiracy against the government, which ought to have been altogether a Political History, has evidently attended more to the elegance of narration, and the painting of characters, than to the unfolding of secret causes and springs. Instead of that complete information, which we would naturally have expected from him, of the state of parties in Rome, and of that particular conjuncture of affairs, which enabled so desperate a profligate as Catiline to become so formidable to government, he has given us little more than a general declamatory account of the luxury and corruption of manners in that age, compared with the simplicity of former times.

I by no means, however, mean to censure all the ancient Historians as defective in political information. No historians can be more instructive than Thucydides, Polybius, and Tacitus. Thucydides is grave, intelligent, and judicious; always attentive to give very exact information concerning every operation which he relates; and to shew the advantages or disadvantages of every plan that was proposed and every measure that was pursued. Polybius excels in comprehensive political views, in penetration into great systems, and in his profound and distinct knowledge of all military affairs. Tacitus is eminent for his knowledge of the human heart; is sentimental and refined in a high degree; conveys much instruction with respect to political matters, but more with respect to human nature.

But when we demand from the Historian profound and instructive views of his subject, it is not meant that he should be frequently interrupting the course of his History, with his own reflections and speculations. He should give us all the information that is necessary for our fully understanding the affairs which he records. He should make us acquainted with the political constitution, the force, the revenues, the internal state of the country of which he writes; and with its interests and connections in respect of neighbouring countries. He should place us, as on an elevated station, whence we may have an extensive prospect of all the causes that co-operate in bringing forward the events which are related. But having put into our hands all the proper materials for judgment, he should not be too prodigal of his own opinions and reasonings. When an Historian is much given to dissertation, and is ready to philosophise and speculate on all that he records, a suspicion naturally arises, that he will be in hazard of adapting his narrative of facts to favour some system which he has formed to himself. It is rather by fair and judicious narration, that history should instruct us, than by delivering instruction in an avowed and direct manner. On some occasions, when doubtful points require to be scrutinized, or when some great event is in agitation, concerning the causes or circumstances of which mankind have been much divided, the narrative may be allowed to stand still for a little; the Historian may appear, and may with propriety enter into some weighty discussion. But he must take care not to cloy his Readers with such discussions, by repeating them too often.

When observations are to be made concerning human nature in general, or the peculiarities of certain characters, if the Historian can artfully incorporate such observations with his narrative, they will have a better effect than when they are delivered as formal detached reflections. For instance: in the life of Agricola, Tacitus, speaking of Domitian's treatment of Agricola, makes this observation; "Proprium humani ingenii est, odisse quem læseris."*

* "It belongs to human nature to hate the man whom you have injured."

The observation is just and well applied; but the form, in which it stands, is abstract and philosophical. A thought of the same kind has a finer effect elsewhere in the same Historian, when speaking of the jealousies which Germanicus knew to be entertained against him by Livia and Tiberius: "Anxius," says he, "occultis in se patrum aviæque odiis, quorum causæ acriores quia iniquæ." * Here a profound moral observation is made; but it is made, without the appearance of making it in form; it is introduced as a part of the narration, in assigning a reason for the anxiety of Germanicus. We have another instance of the same kind; in the account which he gives of a mutiny raised against Rufus, who was a "Præfectus Castrorum," on account of the severe labour which he imposed on the soldiers. "Quippe Rufus, diu manipularis, dein centurio, mox castris præfectus, antiquam duramque militiam revocabat; vetus operis & laboris, et eo immitior quia toleraverat." † There was room for turning this into a general observation, that they who have been educated and hardened in toils, are commonly found to be the most severe in requiring the like toils from others. But the manner in which Tacitus introduces this sentiment as a stroke in the character of Rufus;

* "Uneasy in his mind, on account of the concealed hatred entertained against him by his uncle and grandmother, which was the more bitter because the cause of it was unjust."

† "For Rufus, who had long been a common soldier, afterwards a Centurion, and at length a general officer, restored the severe military discipline of ancient times. Grown old amidst toils and labours, he was the more rigid in imposing them, because he had been accustomed to bear them."

gives it much more life and spirit. This Historian has a particular talent of intermixing after this manner, with the course of his narrative, many striking sentiments and useful observations.

Let us next proceed to consider the proper qualities of Historical Narration. It is obvious, that on the manner of narration much must depend, as the first notion of History is the recital of past facts; and how much one mode of recital may be preferable to another, we shall soon be convinced, by thinking of the different effects, which the same story, when told by two different persons, is found to produce.

The first virtue of Historical Narration, is Clearness, Order, and due Connection. To attain this, the Historian must be completely master of his subject; he must see the whole as at one view; and comprehend the chain and dependence of all its parts, that he may introduce every thing in its proper place; that he may lead us smoothly along the tract of affairs which are recorded, and may always give us the satisfaction of seeing how one event arises out of another. Without this, there can be neither pleasure nor instruction, in reading History. Much for this end will depend on the observance of that unity in the general plan and conduct, which, in the preceding Lecture, I recommended. Much too will depend on the proper management of transitions, which forms one of the chief ornaments of this kind of writing, and is one of the most difficult in execution. Nothing tries an Historian's abilities more, than so to lay his train beforehand, as to make us pass naturally and agreeably from one part of his subject to another; to employ no clumsy and awkward junctures; and to contrive ways and means of forming some union among transactions, which seem to be most widely separated from one another.

In the next place, as History is a very dignified species of Composition, gravity must always be maintained in the narration. There must be no meanness nor vulgarity in the style; no quaint, nor colloquial phrases; no affectation of pertness, or of wit. The smart, or the sneering manner of telling a story, is inconsistent with the historical character. I do not say, that an Historian is never to let himself down. He may sometimes do it with propriety, in order to diversify the strain of his narration, which, if it be perfectly uniform, is apt to become tiresome. But he should be careful never to descend too far: and, on occasions where a light or ludicrous anecdote is proper to be recorded, it is generally better to throw it into a note, than to hazard becoming too familiar by introducing it into the body of the work.

But an Historian may possess these qualities of being perspicuous, distinct, and grave, and may notwithstanding be a dull Writer; in which case we shall reap little benefit from his labours. We shall read him without pleasure; or, most probably, we shall soon give over reading him at all. He must therefore study to render his narration interesting; which is the quality that chiefly distinguishes a Writer of genius and eloquence.

Two things are especially conducive to this; the first is, a just medium in the conduct of narration, between a rapid or crowded recital of facts, and a prolix detail. The former embarrasses, and the latter tires us. An Historian that would interest us, must know when to be concise, and where he ought to enlarge; passing concisely over slight and unimportant events, but dwelling on such as are striking and considerable in their nature, or pregnant with consequences ; preparing beforehand our attention to them, and bringing them forth into the most full and conspicuous light. The next thing he must attend to, is a proper selection of the circumstances belonging to those events which he chooses to relate fully. General facts make a slight impression on the mind. It is by means of circumstances and particulars properly chosen, that a narration becomes interesting and affecting to the Reader. These give life, body, and colouring to the recital of facts, and enable us to behold them as present, and passing before our eyes. It is this employment of circumstances, in Narration, that is properly termed Historical Painting.

In all these virtues of narration, particularly in this last, of picturesque descriptive Narration, several of the Ancient Historians eminently excel. Hence, the pleasure that is found in reading Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, Livy, Sallust, and Tacitus. They are all conspicuous for the art of Narration. Herodotus is, at all times, an agreeable Writer, and relates every thing with that naïveté and simplicity of manner, which never fails to interest the Reader. Though the manner of Thucydides be more dry and harsh, yet on great occasions, as when he is giving an account of the plague of Athens, the Siege of Plataea, the Sedition in Corcyra, the Defeat of the Athenians in Sicily, he displays a very strong and masterly power of description. Xenophon's Cyropædia, and his Anabasis, or retreat of the Ten Thousand, are extremely beautiful. The circumstances are finely selected, and the narration is easy and engaging : but his Hellenics, or Continuation of the History of Thucydides, is a much inferior work. Sallust's Art of Historical Painting in his Catilinarian, but, more especially in his Jugurthine War, is well known; though his Style is liable to censure, as too studied and affected.

Livy is more unexceptionable in his manner; and is excelled by no historian whatever in the Art of Narration; several remarkable examples might be given from him. His account, for instance, of the famous defeat of the Roman Army by the Samnites, at the Furcæ Caudinæ, in the beginning of the ninth book, affords one of the most beautiful exemplifications of Historical Painting, that is any where to be met with. We have first, an exact description of the narrow pass between two mountains, into which the enemy had decoyed the Romans. When they find themselves caught, and no hope of escape left, we are made to see, first, their astonishment, next, their indignation, and then their dejection, painted in the most lively manner, by such circumstances and actions as were natural to persons in their situation. The restless and unquiet manner in which they pass the night; the consultations of the Samnites; the various measures proposed to be taken; the messages between the two armies, all heighten the scene. At length, in the morning, the Consuls return to the Camp, and inform them that they could receive no other terms but that of surrendering their arms, and passing under the yoke, which was considered as the last mark of ignominy for a conquered army. Part of what then follows, I shall give in the Author's own words. "Redintegavit luctum in castris consulum
" adventus; ut vix ab iis abstinerent manus, quorum
" temeritate in eum locum deducti essent. Alii “ alios intueri, contemplari arma mox tradendá, & “ inermes futuras dextras; proponere sibimet ipsi “ ante oculos, jugum hostile, et ludibria victoris, et “ vultus superbos, et per armatos inermium iter. Inde “ fædi agminis miserabilem viam; per sociorum urbes “ reditum in patriam ac parentes quo sæpe ipsi trium-“ phantes venissent. Se solos sine vulnere, sine ferro, “ sine acie victos; sibi non stringere licuisse gladios,

 “ non manum cum hoste conserere; sibi nequicquam
 “ arma, nequicquam vires, nequicquam animos datos.
 “ Hæc frementibus, hora fatalis ignominiaë advenit.
 “ Jamprimùm cum singulis vestimentis, inermes extra “ vallum abire jussi. Tum a consulibus abire lictores “ jussi, paludamentaque detracta. Tantam hoc inter
 “ ipsos, qui paulo ante eos dedendos, lacerandosque “ censuerant, miserationem fecit, ut suæ quisque “ conditionis oblitus, ab illa deformatione tantæ ma-“ jestatis, velut ab nefando spectaculo, averteret ocu-“ los. Primi consules, prope seminudi, sub jugum “ missi,”* &c. The rest of the story, which it

* “ The arrival of the Consuls in the camp, wrought up their “ passions to such a degree, that they could scarcely abstain from “ laying violent hands on them, as by their rashness they had been “ brought into this situation. They began to look on one another;
 “ to cast a melancholy eye on their arms, which were now to be “ surrendered, and on their right hands, which were to become “ defenceless. The yoke under which they were to pass; the “ scoffs of the conquerors; and their haughty looks, when dis“ armed and stripped, they should be led through the hostile lines;
 “ all rose before their eyes. They then looked forward to the sad “ journey which awaited them, when they were to pass as a van“ quished and disgraced army through the territories of their “ alliés, by whom they had often been beheld returning in triumph
 “ to their families and native land. They alone, they muttered, “ to one another, without an engagement, without a single blow, would be too long to insert, is carried on with the same beauty, and full of picturesque circumstances.*

“ had been conquered. To their hard fate it fell, never to have “ had it in their power to draw a sword, or to look an enemy in the “ face; to them only, arms, strength, and courage had been given “ in vain. While they were thus giving vent to their indignation, the “ fatal moment of their ignominy arrived. First, they were all com“ manded to come forth from the camp, without armour, and in a “ single garment. Next, orders were given, that the Consuls should “ be left without their Lictors, and that they should be stripped “ of their robes. Such commiseration did this affront excite among “ them, who, but a little before, had been for delivering up those “ very Consuls to the enemy, and for putting them to death, that “ every one forgot his own condition, and turned his eyes aside “ from this infamous disgrace, suffered by the consular dignity, as “ from a spectacle, which was too detestable to be beheld. The “ Consuls, almost half-naked, were first made to pass under the “ yoke,” &c.

* The description which Cæsar gives of the consternation occasioned in his camp, by the accounts which were spread among his troops, of the ferocity, the size, and the courage of the Germans, affords an instance of Historical Painting, executed in a simple manner; and, at the same time, exhibiting a natural and lively scene. “ Dum paucos dies ad Vesontionem moratur, ex per“ cunctatione nostrorum, vocibusque Gallorum ac mercatorum, “ qui ingenti magnitudine corporum Germanos, incredibili virtute, “ atque exercitatione in armis esse prædicabant; sæpe numero “ sese cum iis congressos, ne vultum quidem atque aciem oculo-“ rum ferre potuisse; tantus subito terror omnem exercitum occu-“ pavit, ut non mediocriter omnium mentes animosque perturbaret.
 “ Hic primum ortus est a tribunis militum, ac præfectis, reliquis-“ que qui ex urbe, amicitiae causa, Cæsarem secuti, suum pericu-“ lum miserabantur, quod non magnum in re militari usum habe“ bant quorum alius, aliâ causâ illatâ quam sibi ad proficiscendum “ necessariam esse diceret, petebat ut ejus voluntate discedere “ liceret. Nonnulli pudore adducti, ut timoris suspicionem vita-
 “ rent remanebant. Hi neque vultum fingere, neque interdum “ lacrymas tenere poterant. Abditi in tabernaculis, aut suum

Tacitus is another Author eminent for Historical Painting, though in a manner altogether different from that of Livy. Livy's descriptions are more full, more plain, and natural; those of Tacitus consist in a few bold strokes. He selects one or two remarkable circumstances, and sets them before us in a strong, and, generally, in a new and uncommon light. Such is the following picture of the situation of Rome, and of the Emperor Galba, when Otho was advancing against him: "Agebatur huc illic Galba, vario turbæ fluctuantis impulsu, completis undique basilicis et templis, lugubri prospectu. Neque populi aut plebis ulla vox; sed attoniti vultus, et conversæ ad omnia aures. Non tumultus, non quies; sed quale magni metus et magnæ iræ, silentium est."* No image in any Poet is more strong and expressive than this last stroke of the description: "Non tumultus, non quies; sed quale," &c. This is a conception of the sublime kind, and discovers high genius. Indeed, throughout all his work, Tacitus shews the hand of a master. As he is profound in reflection, so he is striking in description, and pathetic in sentiment. The Philosopher, the Poet, and the Historian all meet in him. Though the period

" fatum querebantur, aut cum familiaribus suis, commune periculum miserabantur. Vulgo, totis castris testamenta obsignabantur." DE BELL. GALL. L. I.

* "Galba was driven to and fro by the tide of the multitude, shoving him from place to place. The temples and public buildings were filled with crowds of a dismal appearance. No clamours were heard, either from the citizens or from the rabble. Their countenances were filled with consternation; their ears were employed in listening with anxiety. It was not a tumult; it was not quietness; it was the silence of terror, and of wrath."

of which he writes may be reckoned unfortunate for an Historian, he has made it afford us many interesting exhibitions of human nature. The relations which he gives of the deaths of several eminent personages are as affecting as the deepest tragedies. He paints with a glowing pencil; and possesses, beyond all writers, the talent of painting, not to the imagination merely, but to the heart. With many of the most distinguished beauties, he is, at the same time, not a perfect model for History; and such as have formed themselves upon him, have seldom been successful. He is to be admired, rather than imitated. In his reflections, he is too refined; in his style too concise, sometimes quaint and affected, often abrupt and obscure. History seems to require a more natural, flowing, and popular manner.

The Ancients employed one embellishment of History, which the Moderns have laid aside, I mean Orations, which, on weighty occasions, they put into the mouths of some of their chief personages. By means of these, they diversified their history; they conveyed both moral and political instruction; and, by the opposite arguments which were employed, they gave us a view of the sentiments of different parties. Thucydides was the first who introduced this method. The orations with which his History abounds, and those too of some other Greek and Latin Historians, are among the most valuable remains which we have of Ancient Eloquence. How beautiful soever they are, it may be much questioned, I think, whether they find a proper place in History. I am rather inclined to think that they are unsuitable to it. For they form a mixture which is unnatural in History, of fiction with truth. We know that these Orations are entirely of the Author's own composition, and that he has introduced some celebrated person haranguing in a public place, purely that he might have an opportunity of shewing his own eloquence, or delivering his own sentiments, under the name of that person. This is a sort of poetical liberty which does not suit the gravity of history, throughout which an air of the strictest truth should always reign. Orations may be an embellishment to History; such might also Poetical Compositions be, introduced under the name of some of the personages mentioned in the Narration, who were known to have possessed poetical talents. But neither the one nor the other finds a proper place in History. Instead of inserting formal Orations, the method adopted by later Writers seems better and more natural; that of the Historian, on some great occasion, delivering, in his own person, the sentiments and reasonings of the opposite parties, or the substance of what was understood to be spoken in some public Assembly; which he may do without the liberty of fiction.

The drawing of characters is one of the most splendid, and, at the same time, one of the most difficult ornaments of Historical Composition. For characters are generally considered as professed exhibitions of fine writing; and an Historian who seeks to shine in them, is frequently in danger of carrying refinement to excess, from a desire of appearing very profound and penetrating. He brings together so many contrasts, and subtile oppositions of qualities, that we are rather dazzled with sparkling expressions, than entertained with any clear conception of a human character. A Writer who would characterise in an instructive and masterly manner, should be simple in his style, and should avoid all quaintness and affectation; at the same time, not contenting himself with giving us general outlines only, but descending into those peculiarities which mark a character in its most strong and distinctive features. The Greek Historians sometimes give eulogiums, but rarely draw full and professed characters. The two Ancient Authors who have laboured this part of Historical Composition most, are Sallust and Tacitus.

As History is a species of Writing designed for the instruction of mankind, sound morality should always reign in it. Both in describing characters, and in relating transactions, the Author should always shew himself to be on the side of virtue. To deliver moral instruction in a formal manner, falls not within his province; but both as a good man, and as a good Writer, we expect that he should discover sentiments of respect for virtue, and an indignation at flagrant vice. To appear neutral and indifferent with respect to good and bad characters, and to affect a crafty and political, rather than a moral turn of thought, will, besides other bad effects, derogate greatly from the weight of Historical Composition, and will render the strain of it much more cold and uninteresting. We are always most interested in the transactions which are going on, when our sympathy is awakened by the story, and when we become engaged in the fate of the actors. But this effect can never be produced by a Writer who is deficient in sensibility and moral feeling.

As the observations which I have hitherto made have mostly respected the Ancient Historians, it may naturally be expected that I should also take some notice of the Moderns who have excelled in this kind of Writing.

The country in Europe where the Historical Genius has, in later ages, shone forth with most lustre, beyond doubt, is Italy. The national character of the Italians seems favourable to it. They were always distinguished as an acute, penetrating, reflecting people, remarkable for political sagacity and wisdom, and who early addicted themselves to the arts of Writing. Accordingly, soon after the restoration of letters, Machiavel, Guicciardin, Davila, Bentivoglio, Father Paul, became highly conspicuous for historical merit. They all appear to have conceived very just ideas of History; and are agreeable, instructive, and interesting Writers. In their manner of narration, they are formed upon the Ancients; some of them, as Bentivoglio and Guicciardin, have, in imitation of them, introduced Orations into their History. In the profoundness and distinctness of their political views, they may, perhaps, be esteemed to have surpassed the Ancients. Critics have, at the same time, observed some imperfections in each of them. Machiavel, in his History of Florence, is not altogether so interesting as one would expect an author of his abilities to be; either through his own defect, or through some unhappiness in his subject, which led him into a very minute detail of the intrigues of one city. Guicciardin, at all times sensible and profound, is taxed for dwelling so long on the Tuscan affairs as to be sometimes tedious; a defect which is also imputed, occasionally, to the judicious father Paul. Bentivoglio, in his excellent History of the Wars of Flanders, is accused for approaching to the florid and pompous manner; and Davila, though one of the most agreeable and entertaining Relaters, has manifestly this defect, of spreading a sort of uniformity over all his characters, by representing them as guided too regularly by political interest. But, although some such objections may be made to these Authors, they deserve, upon the whole, to be placed in the first rank of Modern Historical Writers. The Wars of Flanders, written in Latin by Famianus Strada, is a book of some note; but is not entitled to the same reputation as the works of the other Historians I have named. Strada is too violently partial to the Spanish cause; and too open a Panegyrist of the Prince of Parma. He is florid, diffuse, and an affected imitator of the manner and style of Livy.

Among the French, as there has been much good Writing in many kinds, so also in the Historical. That ingenious nation, who have done so much honour to Modern Literature, possess, in an eminent degree, the talent of Narration. Many of their later Historical Writers are spirited, lively, and agreeable; and some of them not deficient in profoundness and penetration. They have not, however, produced any such capital Historians as the Italians whom I mentioned above.

Our Island, till within these few years, was not eminent for its historical productions. Early, indeed, Scotland acquired reputation by means of the celebrated Buchanan. He is an elegant Writer, classical in his Latinity, and agreeable both in narration and description. But one cannot but suspect him to be more attentive to elegance, than to accuracy. Accustomed to form his political notions wholly upon the plans of ancient governments, the feudal system seems never to have entered into his thoughts; and as this was the basis of the Scottish constitution, his political views are, of course, inaccurate and imperfect. When he comes to the transactions of his own times, there is such a change in his manner of writing, and such an asperity in his style, that, on what side soever the truth lies with regard to those dubious and long controverted facts which make the subject of that part of his work, it is impossible to clear him from being deeply tinctured with the spirit of party.

Among the older English Historians, the most considerable is Lord Clarendon. Though he writes as the professed apologist of one side, yet there appears more impartiality in his relation of facts than might at first be expected. A great spirit of virtue and probity runs through his work. He maintains all the dignity of an Historian. His sentences, indeed, are often too long, and his general manner is prolix; but his style, on the whole, is manly; and his merit, as an Historian, is much beyond mediocrity. Bishop Burnet is lively and perspicuous; but he has hardly any other historical merit. His style is too careless and familiar for History; his characters are, indeed, marked with a bold and strong hand; but they are generally light and satirical; and he abounds so much in little stories concerning himself, that he resembles more a Writer of Memoirs than of History. During a long period, English Historical Authors seemed to aim at nothing higher than an exact relation of facts; till of late the distinguished names of Hume, Robertson, and Gibbon, have raised the British character, in this species of Writing, to high reputation and dignity.

I observed, in the preceding Lecture, that Annals,

Memoirs, and Lives, are the inferior kinds of Historical Composition. It will be proper, before dismissing this subject, to make a few observations upon them. Annals are commonly understood to signify a collection of facts, digested according to chronological order; rather serving for the materials of History, than aspiring to the name of History themselves. All that is required, therefore, in a Writer of such Annals, is to be faithful, distinct, and complete.

Memoirs denote a sort of Composition, in which an Author does not pretend to give full information of all the facts respecting the period of which he writes, but only to relate what he himself had access to know, or what he was concerned in, or what illustrates the conduct of some person, or the circumstances of some transaction, which he chooses for his subject. From a Writer of Memoirs, therefore, is not expected the same profound research, or enlarged information, as from a Writer of History. He is not subject to the same laws of unvarying dignity and gravity. He may talk freely of himself; he may descend into the most familiar anecdotes. What is chiefly required of him is, that he be sprightly and interesting; and, especially, that he inform us of things that are useful and curious; that he convey to us some sort of knowledge worth the acquiring. This is a species of Writing very bewitching to such as love to write concerning themselves, and conceive every transaction in which they had a share to be of singular importance. There is no wonder, therefore, that a nation so sprightly as the French should, for two centuries past, have been pouring forth a whole flood of Memoirs; the greatest part of which are little more than agreeable trifles.

Some, however, must be excepted from this general character; two in particular; the Memoirs of the Cardinal de Retz, and those of the Duke of Sully. From Retz's Memoirs, besides the pleasure of agreeable and lively narration, we may derive also much instruction, and much knowledge of human nature. Though his politics be often too fine spun, yet the Memoirs of a professed factious leader, such as the Cardinal was, wherein he draws both his own character, and that of several great personages of his time, so fully, cannot be read by any person of good sense without benefit. The Memoirs of the Duke of Sully, in the state in which they are now given to the Public, have great merit, and deserve to be mentioned with particular praise. No Memoirs approach more nearly to the usefulness, and the dignity of a full legitimate History. They have this peculiar advantage, of giving us a beautiful display of two of the most illustrious characters which history presents; Sully himself, one of the ablest and most incorrupt ministers, and Henry IV. one of the greatest and most amiable Princes of modern times. I know few books more full of virtue and of good sense than Sully's Memoirs; few, therefore, more proper to form both the heads and the hearts of such as are designed for public business, and action, in the world.

Biography, or the Writing of Lives, is a very useful kind of Composition; less formal and stately than History; but to the bulk of Readers, perhaps, no less instructive; as it affords them the opportunity of seeing the characters and tempers, the virtues and failings of eminent men fully displayed; and admits them into a more thorough and intimate acquaintance with such persons, than History generally allows. For a Writer of Lives may descend, with propriety, to minute circumstances, and familiar incidents. It is expected of him, that he is to give the private, as well as the public life, of the person whose actions he records; nay, it is from private life, from familiar, domestic, and seemingly trivial occurrences, that we often receive most light into the real character. In this species of Writing, Plutarch has no small merit; and to him we stand indebted for much of the knowledge that we possess, concerning several of the most eminent personages of antiquity. His matter is, indeed, better than his manner; as he cannot lay claim to any peculiar beauty or elegance. His judgment too, and his accuracy, have sometimes been taxed; but whatever defects of this kind he may be liable to, his Lives of Eminent Men will always be considered as a valuable treasure of instruction. He is remarkable for being one of the most humane Writers of all antiquity; less dazzled than many of them are, with the exploits of valour and ambition; and fond of displaying his great men to us, in the more gentle lights of retirement and private life.

I cannot conclude the subject of History, without taking notice of a very great improvement which has, of late years, begun to be introduced into Historical Composition; I mean, a more particular attention than was formerly given to laws, customs, commerce, religion, literature, and every other thing that tends to shew the spirit and genius of nations. It is now understood to be the business of an able Historian to exhibit manners, as well as facts and events; and assuredly, whatever displays the state and life of mankind, in different periods, and illustrates the progress of the human mind, is more useful and interesting than the detail of sieges and battles. The person, to whom we are most indebted for the introduction of this improvement into History, is the celebrated M. Voltaire, whose genius has shone with such surprising lustre, in so many different parts of literature. His Age of Louis XIV. was one of the first great productions in this taste; and soon drew throughout all Europe, that general attention, and received that high approbation, which so ingenious and eloquent a production merited. His Essay on the general History of Europe, since the days of Charlemagne, is not to be considered either as a History, or the proper plan of an Historical Work; but only as a series of observations on the chief events that have happened throughout several centuries, and on the changes that successively took place in the spirit and manners of different nations. Though, in some dates and facts, it may, perhaps, be inaccurate, and is tinged with those particularities which unhappily distinguish Voltaire's manner of thinking on religious subjects, yet it contains so many enlarged and instructive views, as justly to merit the attention of all who either read or write the History of those ages.

LECTURE XXXVII.

PHILOSOPHICAL WRITING — DIALOGUE — EPISTOLARY WRITING — FICTITIOUS HISTORY.

As History is both a very dignified species of Composition, and by the regular form which it assumes, falls directly under the laws of Criticism, I discoursed of it fully in the two preceding Lectures. The remaining species of Composition, in Prose, afford less room for critical observation.

Philosophical Writing, for instance, will not lead us into any long discussion. As the professed object of Philosophy is to convey instruction, and as they who study it are supposed to do so for instruction, not for entertainment, the style, the form, and dress of such Writings, are less material objects. They are objects, however, that must not be wholly neglected. He who attempts to instruct mankind, without studying, at the same time, to engage their attention, and to interest them in his subject by his manner of exhibiting it, is not likely to prove successful. The same truths, and reasonings, delivered in a dry and cold manner, or with a proper measure of elegance and beauty, will make very different impressions on the minds of men.

It is manifest that every Philosophical Writer must study the utmost perspicuity: and, by reflecting on what was formerly delivered on the subject of perspicuity, with respect both to single words, and the construction of Sentences, we may be convinced that this is a study which demands considerable attention to the rules of Style, and good Writing. Beyond mere perspicuity, strict accuracy and precision are required in a Philosophical Writer. He must employ no words of uncertain meaning, no loose nor indeterminate expressions; and should avoid using words which are seemingly synonymous, without carefully attending to the variation which they make upon the idea.

To be clear then and precise, is one requisite which we have a title to demand from every Philosophical Writer. He may possess this quality, and be at the same time a very dry Writer. He should therefore study some degree of embellishment, in order to render his composition pleasing and graceful. One of the most agreeable, and one of the most useful embellishments which a Philosopher can employ, consists in illustrations taken from historical facts, and the characters of men. All moral and political subjects naturally afford scope for these; and wherever there is room for employing them, they seldom fail of producing a happy effect. They diversify the Composition; they relieve the mind from the fatigue of mere reasoning, and at the same time raise more full conviction than any reasonings produce: for they take Philosophy out of the abstract, and give weight to Speculation, by shewing its connection with real life, and the actions of mankind.

Philosophical Writing admits besides of a polished, a neat, and elegant style. It admits of Metaphors, Comparisons, and all the calm Figures of Speech, by which an Author may convey his sense to the understanding with clearness and force, at the same time that he entertains the imagination. He must take great care, however, that all his ornaments be of the chastest kind, never partaking of the florid or the tumid; which is so unpardonable in a professed Philosopher, that it is much better for him to err on the side of naked simplicity, than on that of too much ornament. Some of the Ancients, as Plato and Cicero, have left us Philosophical Treatises composed with much elegance and beauty. Seneca has been long and justly censured for the affectation that appears in his Style. He is too fond of a certain brilliant and sparkling manner; of antithesis and quaint sentences. It cannot be denied, at the same time, that he often expresses himself with much liveliness and force; though his Style, upon the whole, is far from deserving imitation. In English, Mr. Locke's celebrated Treatise on Human Understanding, may be pointed out as a model, on the one hand, of the greatest clearness and distinctness of Philosophical Style, with very little approach to ornament; Lord Shaftesbury's Writings, on the other hand, exhibit Philosophy dressed up with all the ornament which it can admit; perhaps with more than is perfectly suited to it.

Philosophical Composition sometimes assumes a form, under which it mingles more with works of taste, when carried on in the way of Dialogue and Conversation. Under this form the Ancients have given us some of their chief Philosophical Works; and several of the Moderns have endeavoured to imitate them. Dialogue Writing may be executed in two ways, either as direct conversation, where none but the Speakers appear, which is the method that Plato uses; or as the recital of a conversation, where the Author himself appears, and gives an account of what passed in discourse; which is the method that Cicero generally follows. But though those different methods make some variation in the form, yet the nature of the Composition is at bottom the same in both, and subject to the same laws.

A Dialogue, in one or other of these forms, on some philosophical, moral, or critical subject, when it is well conducted, stands in a high rank among the Works of Taste; but is much more difficult in the execution than is commonly imagined. For it requires more, than merely the introduction of different persons speaking in succession. It ought to be a natural and spirited representation of real conversation; exhibiting the character and manners of the several Speakers, and suiting to the character of each that peculiarity of thought and expression which distinguishes him from another. A Dialogue, thus conducted, gives the Reader a very agreeable entertainment; as by means of the debate going on among the personages, he receives a fair and full view of both sides of the argument; and is, at the same time, amused with polite conversation, and with a display of consistent and well-supported characters. An Author, therefore, who has genius for executing such a Composition after this manner, has it in his power both to instruct and to please.

But the greatest part of Modern Dialogue Writers have no idea of any Composition of this sort; and bating the outward forms of conversation, and that one speaks, and another answers, it is quite the same as if the Author spoke in person throughout the whole. He sets up a Philotheus, perhaps, and a Philatheos, or an A and a B.; who, after mutual compliments, and after admiring the fineness of the morning or evening, and the beauty of the prospects around them, enter into conference concerning some grave matter; and all that we know farther of them is, that the one personates the Author, a man of learning, no doubt, and of good principles; and the other is a man of straw, set up to propose some trivial objections; over which the first gains a most entire triumph, and leaves his sceptical antagonist at the end much humbled, and, generally, convinced of his error. This is a very frigid and insipid manner of writing; the more so, as it is an attempt toward something, which we see the Author cannot support. It is the form, without the spirit of conversation. The Dialogue serves no purpose, but to make awkward interruptions; and we should with more patience hear the Author continuing always to reason himself, and to remove the objections that are made to his principles, than be troubled with the unmeaning appearance of two persons, whom we see to be in reality no more than one.

Among the Ancients, Plato is eminent for the beauty of his Dialogues. The scenery, and the circumstances of many of them, are beautifully painted. The characters of the Sophists, with whom Socrates disputed, are well drawn; a variety of personages are exhibited to us; we are introduced into a real conversation, often supported with much life and spirit, after the Socratic manner. For richness and beauty of imagination, no Philosophic Writer, Ancient or Modern, is comparable to Plato. The only fault of his imagination is, such an excess of fertility as allows it sometimes to obscure his judgment. It frequently carries him into Allegory, Fiction, Enthusiasm, and the airy regions of Mystical Theology. The Philosopher is, at times, lost in the Poet. But whether we be edified with the matter or not, (and much edification he often affords,) we are always entertained with the manner; and left with a strong impression of the sublimity of the Author's genius.

Cicero's Dialogues, or those recitals of conversations which he has introduced into several of his Philosophical and Critical Works, are not so spirited, nor so characteristical as those of Plato. Yet some, as that "De Oratore" especially, are agreeable and well supported. They shew us conversation carried on among some of the principal persons of Ancient Rome, with freedom, good-breeding, and dignity. The Author of the elegant Dialogue "De Causis Corruptæ Eloquentiæ," which is annexed sometimes to the works of Quintilian, and sometimes to those of Tacitus, has happily imitated, perhaps has excelled Cicero, in this manner of writing.

Lucian is a Dialogue Writer of much eminence; though his subjects are seldom such as can entitle him to be ranked among Philosophical Authors. He has given the model of the light and humorous Dialogue, and has carried it to great perfection. A character of levity, and at the same time of wit and penetration, distinguishes all his writings. His great object was, to expose the follies of superstition, and the Pedantry of Philosophy, which prevailed in his age; and he could not have taken any more successful method for this end, than what he has employed in his dialogues, especially in those of the Gods and of the Dead, which are full of pleasantry and satire. In this invention of Dialogues of the Dead, he has been followed by several Modern Authors. Fontenelle, in particular, has given us Dialogues of this sort, which are sprightly and agreeable; but as for characters, whoever his personages be, they all become Frenchmen in his hands. Indeed few things in Composition are more difficult, than in the course of a Moral Dialogue to exhibit characters properly distinguished. As calm conversation furnishes none of those assistances for bringing characters into light, which the active scenes, and interesting situations of the Drama, afford. Hence few Authors are eminent for Characteristical Dialogue on grave subjects. One of the most remarkable in the English Language, is a Writer of the last age, Dr. Henry More, in his Divine Dialogues, relating to the foundations of Natural Religion. Though his Style be now in some measure obsolete, and his Speakers be marked with the Academic stiffness of those times, yet the Dialogue is animated by a variety of character and a sprightlines of Conversation, beyond what are commonly met with in Writings of this kind. Bishop Berkeley's Dialogues concerning the existence of matter, do not attempt any display of Characters; but furnish an instance of a very abstract subject, rendered clear and intelligible by means of Conversation properly managed.

I proceed next to make some observations on Epistolary Writing: which possesses a kind of middle place between the serious and amusing species of Composition. Epistolary Writing appears, at first view, to stretch into a very wide field. For there is no subject whatever, on which one may not convey his thoughts to the Public, in the form of a letter.

Lord. Shaftesbury, for instance, Mr. Harris, and several other Writers, have chosen to give this form to philosophical treatises. But this is not sufficient to class such treatises under the head of Epistolary Composition. Though they bear, in the title-page, a Letter to a Friend, after the first address, the Friend disappears, and we see that it is, in truth, the Public with whom the Author corresponds. Seneca's Epistles are of this sort. There is no probability that they ever passed in correspondence as real letters. They are no other than miscellaneous dissertations on moral subjects; which the Author, for his convenience, chose to put into the epistolary form. Even where one writes a real letter on some formal topic, as of moral or religious consolation to a person under distress, such as Sir William Temple has written to the Countess of Essex on the death of her daughter, he is at liberty, on such occasions, to write wholly as a Divine or as a Philosopher, and to assume the style and manner of one, without reprehension. We consider the Author not as writing a Letter, but as composing a Discourse, suited particularly to the circumstances of some one person.

Epistolary Writing becomes a distinct species of composition, subject to the cognizance of Criticism, only, or chiefly, when it is of the easy and familiar kind; when it is conversation carried on upon paper, between two friends at a distance. Such an intercourse, when well conducted, may be rendered very agreeable to Readers of taste. If the subject of the letters be important, they will be the more valuable. Even though there should be nothing very considerable in the subject, yet if the spirit and turn of the correspondence be agreeable; if they be written in a sprightly manner, and with native grace and ease, they may still be entertaining; more especially if there be any thing to interest us, in the characters of those who write them. Hence the curiosity which the Public has always discovered, concerning the Letters of eminent persons. We expect in them to discover somewhat of their real character. It is childish indeed to expect, that in Letters we are to find the whole heart of the Author unveiled. Concealment and disguise take place, more or less, in all human intercourse. But still, as Letters from one friend to another, make the nearest approach to conversation, we may expect to see more of a character displayed in these than in other productions, which are studied for public view. We please ourselves with beholding the writer in a situation which allows him to be at his ease, and to give vent occasionally to the overflowings of his heart.

Much, therefore, of the merit, and the agreeableness of Epistolary Writing, will depend on its introducing us into some acquaintance with the Writer. There, if any where, we look for the Man, not for the Author. Its first and fundamental requisite is, to be natural and simple; for a stiff and laboured manner is as bad in a Letter as it is in Conversation. This does not banish sprightliness and wit. These are graceful in Letters, just as they are in Conversation; when they flow easily, and without being studied; when employed so as to season, not to cloy. One who, either in Conversation or in Letters, affects to shine and to sparkle always, will not please long. The style of Letters should not be too highly polished. It ought to be neat and correct, but no more. All nicety about words, betrays study; and hence musical periods, and appearances of number and harmony in arrangement; should be carefully avoided in Letters. The best Letters are commonly such as the Authors have written with most facility. What the heart or the imagination dictates, always flows readily; but where there is no subject to warm or interest these, constraint appears; and hence, those Letters of mere compliment, congratulation, or affected condolence, which have cost the Authors most labour in composing, and which, for that reason, they perhaps consider as their master-pieces, never fail of being the most disagreeable and insipid to the Readers.

It ought, at the same time, to be remembered, that the ease and simplicity which I have recommended in Epistolary Correspondence, are not to be understood as importing entire carelessness. In writing to the most intimate friend, a certain degree of attention, both to the subject and the style, is requisite and becoming. It is no more than what we owe both to ourselves, and to the friend with whom we correspond. A slovenly and negligent manner of Writing, is a disobliging mark of want of respect. The liberty, besides, of writing Letters with too careless a hand, is apt to betray persons into imprudence in what they write. The first requisite, both in conversation and correspondence, is to attend to all the proper decorums which our own character, and that of others, demand. An imprudent expression in conversation may be forgotten and pass away; but when we take the pen into our hand, we must remember, that, "Litera scripta manet."

Pliny's Letters are one of the most celebrated collections which the Ancients have given us, in the epistolary way. They are elegant and polite; and exhibit a very pleasing and amiable view of the author. But, according to the vulgar phrase, they smell too much of the lamp. They are too elegant and fine; and it is not easy to avoid thinking, that the Author is casting an eye towards the Public; when he is appearing to write only for his friends. Nothing indeed is more difficult, than for an Author, who publishes his own Letters, to divest himself altogether of attention to the opinion of the world in what he says; by which means, he becomes much less agreeable than a man of parts would be, if, without any constraint of this sort, he were writing to his intimate friend.

Cicero's Epistles, though not so showy as those of Pliny, are, on several accounts, a far more valuable collection; indeed, the most valuable collection of Letters extant in any language. They are Letters of real business, written to the greatest men of the age, composed with purity and elegance, but without the least affectation; and, what adds greatly to their merit, written without any intention of being published to the world. For it appears, that Cicero never kept copies of his own Letters; and we are wholly indebted to the care of his freed-man Tyro for the large collection that was made, after his death, of those which are now extant, amounting to near a thousand.* They contain the most authentic materials of the history of that age; and are the last monuments which remain of Rome in its free state; the greatest part of them being written during that important crisis, when the Republic was on the point of ruin; the most interesting situation, perhaps, which is to be found in the affairs of mankind. To his intimate friends, especially to Atticus, Cicero lays open himself and his heart, with entire freedom. In the course of his correspondence with others, we are introduced into acquaintance with several of the principal personages of Rome; and it is remarkable, that most of Cicero's correspondents, as well as himself, are elegant and polite Writers; which serves to heighten our idea of the taste and manners of that age.

* See his Letter to Atticus, which was written a year or two before his death, in which he tells him, in answer to some enquiries concerning his Epistles, that he had no collection of them, and that Tyro had only about seventy of them.

The most distinguished Collection of Letters in the English Language, is that of Mr. Pope, Dean Swift, and their friends; partly published in Mr. Pope's Works, and partly in those of Dean Swift. This collection is, on the whole, an entertaining and agreeable one; and contains much wit and refinement. It is not, however, altogether free from the fault which I imputed to Pliny's Epistles, of too much study and refinement. In the variety of Letters from different persons, contained in that Collection, we find many that are written with ease, and a beautiful simplicity. Those of Dr. Arbuthnot, in particular, always deserve that praise. Dean Swift's also are unaffected; and as a proof of their being so, they exhibit his character fully, with all its defects; though it were to be wished, for the honour of his memory, that his Epistolary Correspondence had not been drained to the dregs, by so many successive publications as have been given to the world. Several of Lord Bolingbroke's, and of Bishop Atterbury's Letters, are masterly. The censure of writing Letters in too artificial a manner falls heaviest on Mr. Pope himself. There is visibly more study, and less of nature and the heart in his Letters, than in those of some of his correspondents. He had formed himself on the manner of Voiture, and is too fond of writing like a wit. His Letters to Ladies are full of affectation. Even in writing to his friends, how forced an Introduction is the following, of a letter to Mr. Addison: "I am more joyed at your return, than I should be at that of the Sun, as much as I wish for him in this melancholy wet season; but it is his fate too, like your's, to be displeasing to owls and obscene animals, who cannot bear his lustre." How stiff a compliment it is which he pays to Bishop Atterbury! "Though the noise and daily bustle for the Public be now over, I dare say you are still tendering its welfare; as the Sun in winter, when seeming to retire from the world, is preparing warmth and benedictions for a better season." This sentence might be tolerated in a harangue; but is very unsuitable to the Style of one friend corresponding with another.

The gaiety and vivacity of the French genius appear to much advantage in their Letters, and have given birth to several agreeable publications. In the last age, Balzac and Voiture were the two most celebrated Epistolary Writers. Balzac's reputation indeed soon declined, on account of his swelling periods and pompous Style. But Voiture continued long a favourite Author. His Composition is extremely sparkling; he shews a great deal of wit, and can trifle in the most entertaining manner. His only fault is, that he is too open and professed a wit to be thoroughly agreeable as a Letter Writer. The Letters of Madam de Sevigné are now esteemed the most accomplished model of a familiar correspondence. They turn indeed very much upon trifles, the incidents of the day, and the news of the town; and they are overloaded with extravagant compliments, and expressions of fondness, to her favourite daughter; but withal, they shew such perpetual sprightliness, they contain such easy and varied narration, and so many strokes of the most lively and beautiful painting, perfectly free from any affectation, that they are justly entitled to high praise. The letters of Lady Mary Wortley Montague are not unworthy of being named after those of Mad. de Sevigné. They have much of the French ease and vivacity; and retain more the character of agreeable Epistolary Style, than perhaps any Letters which have appeared in the English language.

There remains to be treated of, another Species of Composition in Prose, which comprehends a very numerous, though, in general, a very insignificant class of Writings, known by the name of Romances and Novels. These may, at first view, seem too insignificant to deserve that any particular notice should be taken of them. But I cannot be of this opinion. Mr. Fletcher of Salton, in one of his Tracts, quotes it as the saying of a wise man, that give him the making of all the ballads of a nation, he would allow any one that pleased to make their laws. The saying was founded on reflection and good sense, and is applicable to the subject now before us. For any kind of Writing, how trifling soever in appearance, that obtains a general currency, and especially that early pre-occupies the imagination of the youth of both sexes, must demand particular attention. Its influence is likely to be considerable, both on the morals and taste of a nation.

In fact, Fictitious Histories might be employed for very useful purposes. They furnish one of the best channels for conveying instruction, for painting human life and manners, for shewing the errors into which we are betrayed by our passions, for rendering virtue amiable and vice odious. The effect of well-contrived stories, towards accomplishing these purposes, is stronger than any effect that can be produced by simple and naked instruction; and hence we find, that the wisest men in all ages have more or less employed fables and fictions, as the vehicles of knowledge. These have ever been the basis of both Epic and Dramatic Poetry. It is not, therefore, the nature of this sort of Writing, considered in itself, but the faulty manner of its execution, that can expose it to any contempt. Lord Bacon takes notice of our taste for Fictitious History, as a proof of the greatness and dignity of the human mind. He observes very ingeniously, that the objects of this world, and the common train of affairs which we behold going on in it, do not fill the mind, nor give it entire satisfaction. We seek for something that shall expand the mind in a greater degree: we seek for more heroic and illustrious deeds, for more diversified and surprising events, for a more splendid order of things, a more regular and just distribution of rewards and punishments than what we find here: because we meet not with these in true history, we have recourse to fictitious. We create worlds according to our fancy, in order to gratify our capacious desires: "Accommodando," says that great Philosopher, "rerum simulachra ad animi desideria, non submittendo animum rebus, quod ratio facit, et historia."* Let us then, since the subject wants neither dignity nor use, make a few observations on the rise and progress of Fictitious History, and the different forms it has assumed in different countries.

In all countries we find its origin very ancient. The genius of the Eastern nations, in particular, was from the earliest times much turned towards invention and the love of fiction. Their Divinity, their Philosophy, and their Politics, were clothed in fables and parables. The Indians, the Persians, and Arabians, were all famous for their tales. The "Arabian Nights' Entertainments" are the production of a romantic invention, but of a rich and amusing imagination; exhibiting a singular and curious display of manners and characters, and beautified with a very humane morality. Among the ancient Greeks, we hear of the Ionian and Milesian Tales; but they have now perished; and, from any account that we have of them, appear to have been of the loose and wanton kind. Some Fictitious Histories yet remain, that were composed during the decline of the Roman Empire, by Apuleius, Achilles Tatius, and Heliodorus bishop of Trica, in the fourth century; but none of them are considerable enough to merit particular criticisms.

During the dark ages, this sort of writing assumed

* "Accommodating the appearances of things to the desires of the mind, not bringing down the mind, as history and philosophy do, to the course of events."

a new and very singular form, and for a long while made a great figure in the world. The martial spirit of those nations, among whom the feudal government prevailed; the establishment of single combat, as an allowed method of deciding causes both of justice and honour; the appointment of champions in the cause of women, who could not maintain their own rights by the sword; together with the institution of military tournaments, in which different kingdoms vied with one another, gave rise, in those times, to that marvellous system of chivalry, which is one of the most singular appearances in the history of mankind: Upon this were founded those romances of knight-errantry, which carried an ideal chivalry to a still more extravagant height than it had risen in fact. There was displayed in them a new and very wonderful sort of world, hardly bearing any resemblance to the world in which we dwell. Not only knights setting forth to redress all manner of wrongs, but in every page, magicians, dragons, and giants, invulnerable men, winged horses, enchanted armour, and enchanted castles; adventures absolutely incredible, yet suited to the gross ignorance of these ages, and to the legends, and superstitious notions concerning magic and necromancy, which then prevailed: This merit they had, of being writings of the highly moral and heroic kind. Their knights were patterns, not of courage merely, but of religion, generosity, courtesy, and fidelity; and the heroines were no less distinguished for modesty, delicacy, and the utmost dignity of manners.

These were the first Compositions that received the name of Romances. The origin of this name is traced, by Mr. Huet, the learned bishop of Ayranche, to the Provençal Troubadoures, a sort of story-tellers and bards in the county of Provence, where there subsisted some remains of literature and poetry. The language which prevailed in that country was a mixture of Latin and Gallic, called the Roman or Romance Language; and, as the stories of those Troubadoures were written in that language, hence it is said the name of Romance, which we now apply to all fictitious Composition.

The earliest of these Romances is that which goes under the name of Turpin, the archbishop of Rheims, written in the 11th century. The subject is, the Achievements of Charlemagne and his Peers, or Paladins, in driving the Saracens out of France and part of Spain; the same subject which Ariosto has taken for his celebrated poem of Orlando Furioso, which is truly a Chivalry Romance, as extravagant as any of the rest, but partly heroic, and partly comic, embellished with the highest graces of poetry. The Romance of Turpin was followed by Amadis de Gaul, and many more of the same stamp. The Crusades both furnished new matter, and increased the spirit for such Writings; the Christians against the Saracens made the common ground-work of them; and from the 11th to the 16th century they continued to bewitch all Europe. In Spain, where the taste for this sort of writing had been most greedily caught, the ingenious Cervantes, in the beginning of the last century, contributed greatly to explode it; and the abolition of tournaments, the prohibition of single combat, the disbelief of magic and enchantments, and the change in general of manners throughout Europe, began to give a new turn to fictitious Composition.

Then appeared the Astræa of D'urfé, the Grand

Cyrus, the Clelia and Cleopatra of Mad. Scuderi, the Arcadia of Sir Philip Sidney, and other grave and stately Compositions in the same style. These may be considered as forming the second stage of Romance writing. The heroism and the gallantry, the moral and virtuous turn of the chivalry romance, were still preserved; but the dragons, the necromancers, and the enchanted castles, were banished, and some small resemblance to human nature was introduced. Still, however, there was too much of the marvellous in them to please an age which now aspired to refinement. The characters were discerned to be strained; the style to be swoln; the adventures incredible; the books themselves were voluminous and tedious.

Hence, this sort of Composition soon assumed a third form, and from magnificent Heroic Romance, dwindled down to the Familiar Novel. These novels, both in France and England, during the age of Lewis XIV. and King Charles II., were in general of a trifling nature, without the appearance of moral tendency, or useful instruction. Since that time, however, somewhat better has been attempted, and a degree of reformation introduced into the spirit of Novel Writing. Imitations of life and character have been made their principal object. Relations have been professed to be given of the behaviour of persons in particular interesting situations; such as may actually occur in life; by means of which, what is laudable or defective in character and conduct, may be pointed out, and placed in an useful light. Upon this plan, the French have produced some compositions of considerable merit. Gil Blas, by Le Sage, is a book full of good sense, and instructive knowledge of the world. The works of Marivaux, especially his Marianne, discover great refinement of thought, great penetration into human nature, and paint with a very delicate pencil, some of the nicest shades and features in the distinction of characters. The Nouvelle Heloise of Rousseau is a production of a very singular kind; in many of the events which are related, improbable and unnatural; in some of the details tedious, and for some of the scenes which are described justly blameable; but withal, for the power of eloquence, for tenderness of sentiment, for ardour of passion, entitled to rank among the highest productions of Fictitious History.

In this kind of Writing we are, it must be confessed, in Great Britain, inferior to the French. We neither relate so agreeably, nor draw characters with so much delicacy; yet we are not without some performances which discover the strength of the British genius. No fiction, in any language, was ever better supported than the Adventures of Robinson Crusoe. While it is carried on with that appearance of truth and simplicity, which takes a strong hold of the imagination of all Readers, it suggests, at the same time, very useful instruction; by shewing how much the native powers of man may be exerted for surmounting the difficulties of any external situation. Mr. Fielding's Novels are highly distinguished for their humour; a humour which, if not of the most refined and delicate kind, is original, and peculiar to himself. The characters which he draws are lively and natural, and marked with the strokes of a bold pencil. The general scope of his stories is favourable to humanity and goodness of heart; and in Tom Jones, his greatest work, the artful conduct of the fable, and the subserviency of all the incidents to the winding up of the whole, deserve much praise. The most moral of all our Novel Writers is Richardson, the Author of Clarissa, a writer of excellent intentions, and of very considerable capacity and genius; did he not possess the unfortunate talent of spinning out pieces of amusement into an immeasurable length. The trivial performances which daily appear in public under the title of Lives, Adventures, and Histories, by anonymous Authors, if they be often innocent, yet are most commonly insipid; and though in the general it ought to be admitted that Characteristical Novels, formed upon Nature and upon Life, without extravagance, and without licentiousness, might furnish an agreeable and useful entertainment to the mind; yet considering the manner in which these Writings have been, for the most part, conducted, it must also be confessed, that they oftener tend to dissipation and idleness, than to any good purpose. Let us now, therefore, make our retreat from these regions of fiction.

LECTURE XXXVIII.

NATURE OF POETRY—ITS ORIGIN AND PROGRESS —VERSIFICATION.

I HAVE now finished my observations on the different kinds of Writing in Prose. What remains is, to treat of Poetical Composition. Before entering on the consideration of any of its particular kinds, I design this Lecture as an Introduction to the subject of Poetry in general; wherein I shall treat of its nature, give an account of its origin, and make some observations on Versification, or Poetical Numbers.

Our first enquiry must be, what is Poetry? and wherein does it differ from Prose? The answer to this question is not so easy as might at first be imagined; and Critics have differed and disputed much concerning the proper definition of Poetry. Some have made its essence to consist in fiction, and support their opinion by the authority of Aristotle and Plato. But this is certainly too limited a definition; for though fiction may have a great share in many Poetical Compositions, yet many subjects of Poetry may not be feigned; as where the Poet describes objects which actually exist, or pours forth the real sentiments of his own heart. Others have made the characteristic of Poetry to lie in imitation. But this is altogether loose; for several other arts imitate as well as Poetry; and an imitation of human manners and characters, may be carried on in the humblest Prose, no less than in the more lofty Poetic strain.

The most just and comprehensive definition which, I think, can be given of Poetry, is, "That it is the language of passion, or of enlivened imagination, formed, most commonly, into regular numbers." The Historian, the Orator, the Philosopher, address themselves, for the most part, primarily to the understanding: their direct aim is to inform, to persuade, or to instruct. But the primary aim of a Poet is to please, and to move; and, therefore, it is to the Imagination, and the Passions, that he speaks. He may, and he ought to have it in his view, to instruct and to reform; but it is indirectly, and by pleasing and moving, that he accomplishes this end. His mind is supposed to be animated by some interesting object which fires his Imagination, or engages his Passions; and which, of course, communicates to his Style a peculiar elevation suited to his ideas; very different from that mode of expression, which is natural to the mind in its calm, ordinary state. I have added to my definition, that this language of Passion, or imagination, is formed, most commonly, into regular numbers; because, though Versification be, in general, the exterior distinction of Poetry, yet there are some forms of Verse so loose and familiar, as to be hardly distinguishable from Prose; such as the Verse of Terence's Comedies; and there is also a species of Prose, so measured in its cadence, and so much raised in its tone, as to approach very near to Poetical Numbers; such as the Telemachus of Fenelon; and the English Translation of Ossian. The truth is, Verse and Prose, on some occasions, run into one another, like light and shade. It is hardly possible to determine the exact limit where Eloquence ends, and Poetry begins; nor is there any occasion for being very precise about the boundaries, as long as the nature of each is understood. These are the minutiae of Criticism, concerning which frivolous Writers are always disposed to squabble; but which deserve not any particular discussion. The truth and justness of the definition, which I have given of Poetry, will appear more fully from the account which I am now to give of its origin, and which will tend to throw light on much of what I am afterwards to deliver, concerning its various kinds.

The Greeks, ever fond of attributing to their own nation the invention of all sciences and arts, have ascribed the origin of Poetry to Orpheus, Linus, and Musæus. There were, perhaps, such persons as these, who were the first distinguished bards in the Grecian Countries. But long before such names were heard of, and among nations where they were never known, Poetry existed. It is a great error to imagine, that Poetry and Music are Arts which belong only to polished nations. They have their foundation in the nature of man, and belong to all nations, and to all ages; though, like other arts founded in nature, they have been more cultivated, and, from a concurrence of favourable circumstances, carried to greater perfection in some countries, than in others. In order to explore the rise of Poetry, we must have recourse to the deserts and the wilds; we must go back to the age of hunters and of shepherds; to the highest antiquity: and to the simplest form of manners among mankind.

It has been often said, and the concurring voice of all antiquity affirms, that Poetry is older than Prose. But in what sense this seemingly strange Paradox holds true, has not always been well understood. There never, certainly, was any period of society in which men conversed together in Poetical numbers. It was in very humble and scanty Prose, as we may easily believe, that the first tribes carried on intercourse among themselves, relating to the wants and necessities of life. But from the very beginning of Society, there were occasions on which they met together for feasts, sacrifices, and public assemblies; and on all such occasions, it is well known, that music, song, and dance, made their principal entertainment. It is chiefly in America, that we have had the opportunity of being made acquainted with men in their savage state. We learn from the particular and concurring accounts of Travellers, that, among all the nations of that vast continent, especially among the Northern Tribes, with whom we have had most intercourse, music and song are, at all their meetings, carried on with an incredible degree of enthusiasm; that the chiefs of the Tribe are those who signalize themselves most on such occasions; that it is in songs they celebrate their religious rites; that, by these, they lament their public and private calamities, the death of friends, or the loss of warriors; express their joy on their victories; celebrate the great actions of their nation, and their heroes; excite each other to perform great exploits in war, or to suffer death and torments with unshaken constancy.

Here then we see the first beginnings of Poetic Composition, in those rude effusions, which the enthusiasm of fancy or passion suggested to untaught men, when roused by interesting events, and by their meeting together in public assemblies. Two particulars would early distinguish this language of song, from that in which they conversed on the common occurrences of life; namely, an unusual arrangement of words, and the employment of bold figures of speech. It would invert words, or change them from that order in which they are commonly placed, to that which most suited the train in which they rose in the Speaker's imagination; or which was most accommodated to the cadence of the passion by which he was moved. Under the influence too of any strong emotion, objects do not appear to us such as they really are, but such as passion makes us see them. We magnify and exaggerate; we seek to interest all others in what causes our emotion; we compare the least things to the greatest; we call upon the absent as well as the present, and even address ourselves to things inanimate. Hence, in congruity with those various movements of the mind, arise those turns of expression, which we now distinguish, by the learned names of Hyperbole, Prosopopœia, Simile, &c. but which are no other than the native original language of Poetry among the most barbarous nations.

Man is both a Poet, and a Musician, by nature. The same impulse which prompted the enthusiastic Poetic Style, prompted a certain melody, or modulation of sound, suited to the emotions of Joy or Grief, of Admiration, Love, or Anger. There is a power in sound, which, partly from nature, partly from habit and association, makes such pathetic impressions on the fancy, as delight even the most wild barbarians. Music and Poetry, therefore, had the same rise; they were prompted by the same occasions; they were united in song; and, as long as they continued united, they tended, without doubt, mutually to heighten and exalt each other's power. The first Poets sung their own Verses: and hence the beginning of what we call Versification, or Words arranged in a more artful order than Prose, so as to be suited to some tune or melody. The liberty of transposition, or inversion, which the Poetic Style, as I observed, would naturally assume, made it easier to form the words into some sort of numbers that fell in with the Music of the Song. Very harsh and uncouth, we may easily believe, these numbers would be at first. But the pleasure was felt; it was studied; and Versification, by degrees, passed into an Art.

It appears from what has been said, that the first Compositions which were either recorded by Writing or transmitted by Tradition, could be no other than Poetical Compositions. No other but these, could draw the attention of men in their rude uncivilised state. Indeed they knew no other. Cool reasoning and plain discourse had no power to attract savage Tribes, addicted only to hunting and war. There was nothing that could either rouse the Speaker to pour himself forth, or draw the crowd to listen, but the high powers of Passion, of Music, and of Song. This vehicle, therefore, and no other, could be employed by Chiefs and Legislators, when they meant to instruct or to animate their tribes. There is, likewise, a farther reason why such Compositions only could be transmitted to posterity; because, before Writing was invented, Songs only could last, and be remembered. The ear gave assistance to the memory, by the help of Numbers; fathers repeated and sung them to their children; and by this oral tradition of national Ballads, were conveyed all the historical knowledge, and all the instruction, of the first ages.

The earliest accounts which History gives us concerning all nations, bear testimony to these facts. In the first ages of Greece, Priests, Philosophers, and Statesmen, all delivered their instructions in Poetry. Apollo, Orpheus, and Amphion, their most ancient Bards, are represented as the first tapers of mankind, the first founders of law and civilisation.

Minos and Thales sung to the Lyre the laws which they composed * ; and till the age immediately preceding that of Herodotus, History had appeared in no other form than that of Poetical Tales.

In the same manner, among all other nations, Poets and Songs are the first objects that make their appearance. Among the Scythian or Gothic nations, many of their kings and leaders were Scalders, or Poets; and it is from their Runic Songs, that the most early Writers of their History, such as Saxo-Grammaticus, acknowledge, that they had derived their chief information. Among the Celtic Tribes, in Gaul, Britain, and Ireland, we know, in what admiration their Bards were held, and what great influence they possessed over the people. They were both Poets and Musicians, as all the first Poets, in every country, were. They were always near the person of the chief or sovereign; they recorded all his great exploits; they were employed as the ambassadors between contending tribes, and their persons were held sacred.

From this deduction it follows, that as we have reason to look for Poems and Songs among the Antiquities of all countries, so we may expect, that in the strain of these there will be a remarkable resemblance, during the primitive periods of every country. The occasions of their being composed, are every where nearly the same. The praises of Gods and Heroes, the celebration of famed ancestors, the recital of martial deeds, songs of victory, and songs of lamentation over the misfortunes and death of their countrymen, occur among all nations; and the same enthusiasm and fire, the same wild and irregular, but animated Composition, concise and glowing Style, bold and extravagant Figures of Speech, are the general distinguishing characters of all the most ancient original Poetry. That strong hyperbolical manner which we have been long accustomed to call the Oriental manner of Poetry, (because some of the earliest poetical productions came to us from the East,) is in truth no more Oriental than Occidental; it is characteristical of an age rather than of a country, and belongs, in some measure, to all nations at that period which first gives rise to Music and to Song. Mankind never resemble each other, so much as they do in the beginnings of society. Its subsequent revolutions give birth to the principal distinctions of character among nations, and divert into channels widely separated, that current of human genius and manners, which descends originally from one spring.

* Strabo, l. 10.

Diversity of climate and of manner of living, will, however, occasion some diversity in the strain of the first Poetry of nations; chiefly, according as those nations are of a more ferocious, or of a more gentle spirit; and according as they advance faster or slower in the arts of civilisation. Thus we find all the remains of the ancient Gothic Poetry remarkably fierce, and breathing nothing but slaughter and blood; while the Peruvian and the Chinese Songs turned, from the earliest times, upon milder subjects. The Celtic Poetry, in the days of Ossian, though chiefly of the martial kind, yet had attained a considerable mixture of tenderness and refinement; in consequence of the long cultivation of Poetry among the Celtæ, by means of a series and succession of Bards which had been established for ages. So Lucan informs us :

Vos quoque qui fortes animos, belloque peremptos
Laudibus in longum vates diffunditis ævum
Plurima securi fudistis carmina Bardi.* [L. 44.]

Among the Grecian nations, their early Poetry appears to have soon received a philosophical cast, from what we are informed concerning the subjects of Orpheus, Linus, and Musæus, who treated of Creation and of Chaos, of the Generation of the World, and of the Rise of Things; and we know that the Greeks advanced sooner to philosophy, and proceeded with a quicker pace in all the arts of refinement than most other nations.

The Arabians and the Persians have always been the greatest Poets of the East, and among them, as among other nations, Poetry was the earliest vehicle of all their learning and instruction. † The ancient Arabs, we are informed ‡, valued themselves much on their metrical Compositions, which were of two sorts; the one they compared to loose pearls, and the other to pearls strung. In the former the sentences or verses were without connection, and their

* You too, ye Bards, whom sacred raptures fire,
To chaunt your heroes to your country's lyre,
Who consecrate in your immortal strain,
Brave patriot souls in righteous battle slain;
Securely now the useful task renew,

And noblest themes in deathless songs pursue. ROWE.

† Vid. Voyages de Chardin, chap. de la Poésie des Persans.

‡ Vid. Preliminary Discourse to Sale's Translation of the Koran.

beauty arose from the elegance of the expression, and the acuteness of the sentiment. The moral doctrines of the Persians were generally comprehended in such independent proverbial apophthegms, formed into verse. In this respect they bear a considerable resemblance to the Proverbs of Solomon; a great Part of which book consists of unconnected Poetry, like the loose pearls of the Arabians. The same form of Composition appears also in the book of Job. The Greeks seem to have been the first who introduced a more regular structure, and closer connection of parts, into their Poetical Writings.

During the infancy of Poetry all the different kinds of it lay confused, and were mingled in the same Composition, according as inclination, enthusiasm, or casual incidents, directed the Poet's strain. In the Progress of Society and Arts, they began to assume those different regular forms, and to be distinguished by those different names under which we now know them. But in the first rude state of Poetical Effusions, we can easily discern the seeds and beginnings of all the kinds of regular Poetry. Odes and Hymns of every sort, would naturally be among the first Compositions; according as the Bards were moved by religious feelings, by exultation, resentment, love, or any other warm sentiment, to pour themselves forth in Song. Plaintive or Elegiac Poetry, would as naturally arise from lamentations over their deceased friends. The recital of the achievements of their heroes, and their ancestors, gave birth to what we now call Epic Poetry; and as not content with simply reciting these, they would infallibly be led, at some of their public meetings, to represent them, by introducing different Bards speaking in the character of their heroes, and answering each other, we find in this the first outlines of Tragedy, or Dramatic Writing.

None of these kinds of Poetry, however, were in the first ages of Society properly distinguished or separated, as they are now, from each other. Indeed, not only were the different kinds of Poetry then mixed together, but all that we now call Letters; or Composition of any kind, was then blended in one mass. At first, History, Eloquence, and Poetry were all the same. Whoever wanted to move or to persuade, to inform or to entertain his countrymen and neighbours, whatever was the subject, accompanied his sentiment and tales with the melody of Song. This was the case in that period of society, when the character and occupations of the husbandman and the builder, the warrior and the statesman, were united in one person. When the progress of Society brought on a separation of the different Arts and Professions of Civil Life, it led also by degrees to a separation of the different literary provinces from each other.

The Art of Writing was in process of time invented; records of past transactions began to be kept; men, occupied with the subjects of policy and useful arts, wished now to be instructed and informed, as well as moved. They reasoned and reflected upon the affairs of life; and were interested by what was real, not fabulous, in past transactions. The Historian, therefore, now laid aside the buskins of Poetry; he wrote in Prose, and attempted to give a faithful and judicious relation of former events. The Philosopher addressed himself chiefly to the understanding. The Orator studied to persuade by reasoning, and retained more or less of the ancient passionate and glowing Style, according as it was conducive to his purpose. Poetry became now a separate art, calculated chiefly to please, and confined generally to such subjects as related to the imagination and passions. Even its earliest companion, Music, was in a great measure divided from it.

These separations brought all the literary arts into a more regular form; and contributed to the exact and accurate cultivation of each. Poetry, however, in its ancient original condition, was perhaps more vigorous than it is in its modern state. It included then, the whole burst of the human mind; the whole exertion of its imaginative faculties. It spoke then the language of passion, and no other; for to passion it owed its birth. Prompted and inspired by objects which to him seemed great, by events which interested his country or his friends, the early Bard arose and sung. He sung indeed in wild and disorderly strains; but they were the native effusions of his heart; they were the ardent conceptions of admiration or resentment, of sorrow or friendship, which he poured forth. It is no wonder, therefore, that in the rude and artless strain of the first Poetry of all nations, we should often find somewhat that captivates and transports the mind. In after-ages, when Poetry became a regular art, studied for reputation and for gain, Authors began to affect what they did not feel. Composing coolly in their closets, they endeavoured to imitate passion, rather than to express it; they tried to force their imagination into raptures, or to supply the defect of native warmth, by those artificial ornaments which might give Composition a splendid appearance.

The separation of Music from Poetry, produced consequences not favourable in some respects to Poetry, and in many respects hurtful to * Music. As long as they remained united, Music enlivened and animated Poetry, and Poetry gave force and expression to musical sound. The Music of that early period was, beyond doubt, extremely simple; and must have consisted chiefly of such pathetic notes, as the voice could adapt to the words of the Song. Musical instruments, such as flutes, and pipes, and a lyre with a very few strings, appear to have been early invented among some nations; but no more was intended by these instruments, than simply to accompany the voice, and to heighten the melody of Song. The Poet's strain was always heard; and, from many circumstances, it appears, that among the ancient Greeks, as well as among other nations, the Bard sung his verses, and played upon his harp or lyre at the same time. In this state the art of music was, when it produced all those great effects of which we read so much in ancient history. And certain it is, that from simple Music only, and from Music accompanied with Verse or Song, we are to look for strong expression and powerful influence over the human mind. When instrumental Music came to be studied as a separate art, divested of the Poet's Song, and formed into the artificial and intricate combinations of harmony, it lost all its ancient power of inflaming the hearers with strong emotions; and sunk into an art of mere amusement, among polished and luxurious nations.

* See Dr. Brown's Dissertation on the Rise, Union, and Separation of Poetry and Music.

Still, however, Poetry preserves, in all countries, some remains of its first and original connection with Music. By being uttered in Song, it was formed into numbers, or into an artificial arrangement of words and syllables, very different in different countries; but such as, to the inhabitants of each, seemed most melodious and agreeable in sound. Whence arises that great characteristic of Poetry which we now call verse; a subject which comes next to be treated of.

It is a subject of a curious nature; but as I am sensible, that, were I to pursue it as far as my inclination leads, it would give rise to discussions, which the greater part of Readers would consider as minute, I shall confine myself to a few observations upon English Versification.

Nations, whose language and pronunciation were of a musical kind, rested their Versification chiefly upon the quantities, that is, the length or shortness of their syllables. Others, who did not make the quantities of their syllables be so distinctly perceived in pronouncing them, rested the melody of their Verse upon the number of syllables it contained, upon the proper disposition of accents and pauses in it, and frequently upon that return of corresponding sounds, which we call Rhyme. The former was the case with the Greeks and Romans; the latter is the case with us, and with most modern nations. Among the Greeks and Romans, every syllable, or the far greatest number at least, was known to have a fixed and determined quantity; and their manner of pronouncing rendered this so sensible to the ear, that a long syllable was counted precisely equal in time to two short ones. Upon this principle, the number of syllables contained in their hexameter verse was allowed to vary. It may extend to 17; it can contain, when regular, no fewer than 13: but the musical time was, notwithstanding, precisely the same in every hexameter verse, and was always equal to that of 12 long syllables. In order to ascertain the regular time of every verse, and the proper mixture and succession of long and short syllables which ought to compose it, were invented, what the Grammarians call Metrical Feet, Dactyles, Spondees, Iambus, &c. By these measures was tried the accuracy of Composition in every line, and whether it was so constructed as to complete its proper melody. It was requisite, for instance, that the hexameter verse should have the quantity of its syllables so disposed, that it could be scanned or measured by six metrical feet, which might be either Dactyles or Spondees (as the musical time of both these is the same), with this restriction only, that the fifth foot was regularly to be a Dactyle, and the last a Spondee.*

* Some writers imagine, that the feet in Latin Verse were intended to correspond to bars in Music, and to form musical intervals or distinctions, sensible to the ear in the pronunciation of the line. Had this been the case, every kind of Verse must have had a peculiar order of feet appropriated to it. But the common prosodies show, that there are several forms of Latin Verse which are capable of being measured indifferently, by a series of feet of very different kinds. For instance, what is called the Asclepedæan Verse (in which the first ode of Horace is written) may be scanned either by a Spondeus, two Choriambus's and a Pyrrichius; or by a Spondeus, a Dactylus succeeded by Cæsura and two Dactylus's. The common Pentameter, and some other forms of Verse, admit the like varieties; and yet the melody of the Verse remains always the same, though it be scanned by different feet. This proves, that the metrical feet were not sensible in the pronunciation of the line, but were intended only to regu-

The introduction of these feet into English Verse, would be altogether out of place; for the genius of our language corresponds not in this respect to the Greek or Latin. I say not, that we have no regard to quantity, or to long and short in pronouncing. Many words we have, especially our words consisting of several syllables, where the quantity, or the long and short syllables, are invariably fixed; but great numbers we have also, where the quantity is left altogether loose. This is the case with a great part of our words consisting of two syllables, and with almost all our monosyllables. In general, the difference made between long and short syllables, in our manner of pronouncing them, is so very inconsiderable, and so much liberty is left us for making them either long or short at pleasure, that mere quantity is of very little effect in English Versification. The only perceptible difference among our syllables, arises from some of them being uttered with that stronger percussion of voice which we call Accent. This Accent does not always make the syllable longer, but gives it more force of sound only; and it is upon a certain order and succession late its construction; or applied as measures, to try whether the succession of long and short syllables was such as suited the melody of the Verse: and as feet of different kinds could sometimes be applied for this purpose, hence it happened, that some forms of Verse were capable of being scanned in different ways. For measuring the hexameter line, no other feet were found so proper as Dactyles and Spondees, and therefore by these it is uniformly scanned. But no ear is sensible of the termination of each foot, in reading an hexameter line. From a misapprehension of this matter, I apprehend that confusion has sometimes arisen among Writers in treating of the prosody both of Latin and of English Verse.

of accented and unaccented syllables, infinitely more than upon their being long or short, that the melody of our Verse depends. If we take any of Mr. Pope's lines, and in reciting them alter the quantity of the syllables, as far as our quantities are sensible, the Music of the Verse will not be much injured : whereas, if we do not accent the syllables according as the Verse dictates, its melody will be totally destroyed.*

Our English Heroic Verse is of what may be called an Iambic structure ; that is, composed of a succession nearly alternate of syllables, not short and long, but unaccented and accented. With regard to the place of these accents, however, some liberty is admitted, for the sake of variety. Very often, though not always, the line begins with an unaccented syllable ; and sometimes, in the course of it, two unaccented syllables follow each other. But in general, there are either five, or four, accented syllables in each line. The number of syllables is ten, unless where an Alexandrian Verse is occasionally admitted. In Verses not Alexandrian, instances occur where the line appears to have more than the limited number. But in such instances I apprehend

* See this well illustrated in Lord Monboddo's Treatise of the Origin and Progress of Language, Vol. II. under the head of the Prosody of Language. He shews that this is not only the constitution of our own Verse, but that by our manner of reading Latin Verse, we make its music nearly the same. For we certainly do not pronounce it according to the ancient quantities, so as to make the musical time of one long syllable equal to two short ones ; but according to a succession of accented and unaccented syllables, only mixed in a ratio different from that of our own Verse. No Roman could possibly understand our pronunciation.

it will be found, that some of the liquid syllables are so slurred in pronouncing, as to bring the Verse, with respect to its effect upon the ear, within the usual bounds.

Another essential circumstance in the constitution of our Verse, is the cæsural pause, which falls towards the middle of each line. Some pause of this kind, dictated by the melody, is found in the Verse of most nations. It is found, as might be shewn, in the Latin hexameter. In the French Heroic Verse, it is very sensible. That is a Verse of twelve syllables, and in every line, just after the sixth syllable, there falls regularly and indispensably, a cæsural pause, dividing the line into two equal hemistichs. For example, in the first lines of Boileau's Epistle to the King.

Jeune & vaillant heros | dont la haute sagesse
 N'est point le fruit tardif | d'une lente vieillesse,
 Qui seul sans Ministre | à l'exemple des Dieux
 Soutiens tout par toi-meme | & vois tous par ses yeux.

In this train all their Verses proceed; the one half of the line always answering to the other, and the same chime returning incessantly on the ear without intermission or change; which is certainly a defect in their Verse, and unfits it so very much for the freedom and dignity of Heroic Poetry. On the other hand, it is a distinguishing advantage of our English Verse, that it allows the pause to be varied through four different syllables in the line. The pause may fall after the 4th, the 5th, the 6th, or the 7th syllable; and according as the pause is placed after one or other of these syllables, the melody of the verse is much changed, its air and cadence are diversified.

By this means, uncommon richness and variety are added to English Versification.

When the pause falls earliest, that is, after the 4th syllable, the briskest melody is thereby formed, and the most spirited air given to the line. In the following lines of the Rape of the Lock, Mr. Pope has with exquisite propriety suited the construction of the Verse to the subject :

On her white breast | a sparkling cross she wore,
Which Jews might kiss | and infidels adore ;
Her lively looks | a sprightly mind disclose,
Quick as her eyes | and as unfixed as those,
Favours to none | to all she smiles extends,
Oft she rejects | but never once offends.

When the pause falls after the 5th syllable, which divides the line into two equal portions, the melody is sensibly altered. The Verse loses that brisk and sprightly air, which it had with the former pause, and becomes more smooth, gentle, and flowing.

Eternal sunshine | of the spotless mind,
Each prayer accepted | and each wish resigned.

When the pause proceeds to follow the 6th syllable, the tenor of the Music becomes solemn and grave. The Verse marches now with a more slow and measured pace, than in either of the two former cases.

The wrath of Pelcus' son | the direful spring
Of all the Grecian woes | O goddess, sing !

But the grave solemn cadence becomes still more sensible, when the pause falls after the 7th syllable, which is the nearest place to the end of the line that it can occupy. This kind of Verse occurs the seldest, but has a happy effect in diversifying the melody. It produces that slow Alexandrian air, which is finely suited to a close; and for this reason, such lines almost never occur together, but are used in finishing the couplet.

And in the smooth description | murmur still.
Long loved adored ideas! | all adieu.

I have taken my examples from Verses in rhyme; because in these, our Versification is subjected to the strictest law. As Blank Verse is of a freer kind, and naturally is read with less cadence or tone, the pauses in it, and the effect of them, are not always so sensible to the ear. It is constructed, however, entirely upon the same principles, with respect to the place of the pause. There are some, who, in order to exalt the variety and the power of our Heroic Verse, have maintained that it admits of musical pauses, not only after those four syllables where I assigned their place, but after any one syllable in the Verse indifferently, where the sense directs it to be placed. This, in my opinion, is the same thing as to maintain that there is no pause at all belonging to the natural melody of the Verse; since, according to this notion, the pause is formed entirely to the meaning, not by the music. But this I apprehend to be contrary both to the nature of Versification, and to the experience of every good ear.* Those

* In the Italian Heroic Verse employed by Tasso in his Gierusalemme, and Ariosto in his Orlando, the pauses are of the same varied nature with those which I have shewn to belong to English Versification, and fall after the same four syllables in the line. Marmontel, in his Poétique Française, Vol. I. p. 269. takes notice that this construction of Verse is common to the Italians and the certainly are the happiest lines, wherein the pause prompted by the melody, coincides in some degree with that of the sense, or at least does not tend to spoil or interrupt the meaning. Wherever any opposition between the music and the sense chanced to take place, I observed before, in treating of Pronunciation or Delivery, that the proper method of reading these lines, is to read them according as the sense dictates, neglecting or slurring the cæsural pause, which renders the line less graceful indeed, but, however, does not entirely destroy its sound.

Our Blank Verse possesses great advantages, and is indeed a noble, bold, and disencumbered species of Versification. The principal defect in rhyme, is the full close which it forces upon the ear, at the end of every couplet. Blank Verse is freed from this, and allows the lines to run into each other with as great liberty as the Latin hexameter permits, perhaps with greater. Hence it is particularly suited to subjects of dignity and force, which demand more free and manly numbers than rhyme. The constraint and strict regularity of rhyme, are unfavourable to the sublime, or to the highly pathetic strain. An Epic Poem, or a Tragedy, would be fettered and degraded by it. It is best adapted to compositions of a temperate strain, where no particular vehemence is required in the Sentiments, nor great Sublimity in the Style; such as Pastorals, Elegies, Epistles, Satires, &c. To these it communicates that degree of elevation which is proper for them; and without any other assistance sufficiently distinguishes the Style from Prose. He who should write such Poems in Blank Verse, would render his work harsh and unpleasing. In order to support a poetical Style, he would be obliged to affect a pomp of language, unsuitable to the subject.

English; and defends the uniformity of the French cæsural pause upon this ground, that the alternation of masculine and feminine rhymes, furnishes sufficient variety to the French Poetry; whereas the change of movement occasioned by the four different pauses in English and Italian Verse, produces, according to him, too great diversity. On the head of pauses in English Versification, see the Elements of Criticism, Chap. 18. Sect. 4.

Though I join in opinion with those, who think that rhyme finds its proper place in the middle, but not in the higher regions of Poetry, I can by no means join in the invectives which some have poured out against it, as if it were a mere barbarous jingling of sounds, fit only for children, and owing to nothing but the corruption of taste in the monkish ages. Rhyme might indeed be barbarous in Latin or Greek Verse, because these languages by the sonorousness of their words, by their liberty of transposition and inversion, by their fixed quantities and musical pronunciation, could carry on the melody of verse without its aid. But it does not follow, that therefore it must be barbarous in the English language, which is destitute of these advantages. Every language has powers and graces, and music peculiar to itself; and what is becoming in one, would be ridiculous in another. Rhyme was barbarous in Latin; and an attempt to construct English Verses after the form of hexameters, and pentameters, and Sapphics, is as barbarous among us. It is not true, that rhyme is merely a monkish invention. On the contrary, it has obtained under different forms, in the Versification of most known nations. It is found in the ancient poetry of the northern nations of Europe; it is said to be found among the Arabs, the Persians, the Indians, and the Americans. This shews that there is something in the return of similar sounds, which is grateful to the ears of most part of mankind. And if any one, after reading Mr. Pope's Rape of the Lock, or Eloisa to Abelard, shall not admit our rhyme, with all its varieties of pauses, to carry both elegance, and sweetness of sound, his ear must be pronounced to be of a very peculiar kind.

The present form of our English Heroic rhyme in couplets, is a modern species of Versification. The measure generally used in the days of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles I. was the stanza of eight lines, such as Spenser employs, borrowed from the Italian; a measure very constrained and artificial. Waller was the first who brought couplets into vogue; and Dryden afterwards established the usage. Waller first smoothed our Verse; Dryden perfected it. Mr. Pope's Versification has a peculiar character. It is flowing and smooth in the highest degree; far more laboured and correct than that of any who went before him. He introduced one considerable change into Heroic Verse, by totally throwing aside the triplets, or three lines rhyming together, in which Mr. Dryden abounded. Dryden's Versification, however, has very great merit; and, like all his productions, has much spirit, mixed with carelessness. If not so smooth and correct as Pope's, it is however more varied and easy. He subjects himself less to the rule of closing the sense with the couplet; and frequently takes the liberty of making his couplets run into one another, with somewhat of the freedom of Blank Verse.

LECTURE XXXIX.

PASTORAL POETRY—LYRIC POETRY.

IN the last Lecture, I gave an account of the Rise and Progress of Poetry, and made some observations on the nature of English Versification. I now proceed to treat of the chief kinds of Poetical Composition, and of the critical rules that relate to them. I shall follow that order which is most simple and natural, beginning with the lesser forms of Poetry, and ascending from them to the Epic and Dramatic, as the most dignified. This Lecture shall be employed on Pastoral and Lyric Poetry.

Though I begin with the consideration of Pastoral Poetry, it is not because I consider it as one of the earliest forms of Poetical Composition. On the contrary, I am of opinion that it was not cultivated as a distinct species, or subject of Writing, until society had advanced in refinement. Most Authors have indeed indulged the fancy, that because the life which mankind at first led was rural, therefore their first Poetry was Pastoral, or employed in the celebration of rural scenes and objects. I make no doubt, that it would borrow many of its images and allusions from those natural objects with which men were best acquainted; but I am persuaded, that the calm and tranquil scenes of rural felicity were not, by any means, the first objects which inspired that strain of Composition which we now call Poetry. It was inspired, in the first periods of every nation, by events and objects which roused men's passions; or, at least, awakened their wonder and admiration. The actions of their Gods and Heroes, their own exploits in war, the successes or misfortunes of their countrymen and friends, furnished the first Themes to the Bards of every country. What was of a Pastoral kind in their Compositions, was incidental only. They did not think of chusing for their Theme the tranquillity and the pleasures of the country, as long as these were daily and familiar objects to them. It was not till men had begun to be assembled in great cities, after the distinctions of rank and station were formed, and the bustle of Courts and large Societies was known, that Pastoral Poetry assumed its present form. Men then began to look back upon the more simple and innocent life which their forefathers led, or which, at least, they fancied them to have led: they looked back upon it with pleasure; and in those rural scenes, and pastoral occupations, imagining a degree of felicity to take place superior to what they now enjoyed, conceived the idea of celebrating it in Poetry. It was in the court of King Ptolemy that Theocritus wrote the first Pastorals with which we are acquainted; and in the court of Augustus he was imitated by Virgil.

But whatever may have been the origin of Pastoral Poetry, it is, undoubtedly, a natural and very agreeable form of Poetical Composition. It recalls to our imagination those gay scenes, and pleasing views of nature, which commonly are the delight of our childhood and youth; and to which, in more advanced years, the greatest part of men recur with pleasure. It exhibits to us a life with which we are accustomed to associate the ideas of peace, of leisure, and of innocence; and therefore we readily set open our heart to such representations as promise to banish from our thoughts the cares of the world, and to transport us into calm Elysian regions. At the same time, no subject seems to be more favourable to Poetry. Amidst rural objects, nature presents, on all hands, the finest field for description; and nothing appears to flow more, of its own accord, into Poetical Numbers, than rivers and mountains, meadows and hills, flocks and trees, and shepherds void of care. Hence this species of Poetry has, at all times, allured many Readers, and excited many Writers. But, notwithstanding the advantages it possesses, it will appear, from what I have farther to observe upon it, that there is hardly any species of Poetry which is more difficult to be carried to perfection, or in which fewer Writers have excelled.

Pastoral life may be considered in three different views; either such as it now actually is; when the state of shepherds is reduced to be a mean, servile, and laborious state; when their employments are become disagreeable, and their ideas gross and low: or such as we may suppose it once to have been, in the more early and simple ages, when it was a life of ease and abundance; when the wealth of men consisted chiefly in flocks and herds, and the shepherd, though unrefined in his manners, was respectable in his state: or, lastly, such as it never was, and never can in reality be, when, to the ease, innocence, and simplicity of the early ages, we attempt to add the polished taste and cultivated manners of modern times: Of these three states, the first is too gross and mean, the last too refined and unnatural, to be made the ground-work of Pastoral Poetry. Either of these extremes is a rock upon which the Poet will split, if he approach too near it. We shall be disgusted if he give us too much of the servile employments and low ideas of actual peasants, as Theocritus is censured for having sometimes done; and if, like some of the French and Italian Writers of Pastorals, he makes his Shepherds discourse as if they were courtiers and scholars, he then retains the name only, but wants the spirit of Pastoral Poetry.

He must, therefore, keep in the middle station between these. He must form to himself the idea of a rural state, such as in certain periods of Society may have actually taken place, where there was ease, equality, and innocence; where Shepherds were gay and agreeable, without being learned or refined; and plain and artless, without being gross and wretched. The great charm of Pastoral Poetry arises from the view which it exhibits of the tranquillity and happiness of a rural life. This pleasing illusion, therefore, the Poet must carefully maintain. He must display to us all that is agreeable in that state, but hide whatever is displeasing.* Let him paint

* In the following beautiful lines of the first Eclogue, Virgil has, in the true spirit of a Pastoral Poet, brought together as agreeable an assemblage of images of rural pleasure as can any where be found:

Fortunate senex! hic inter flumina nota,
 Et fontes sacros frigus captabis opacum.
 Hinc tibi, quæ semper vicino ab limite sepes,
 Hyblæis apibus, florem depasta salicti, its simplicity and innocence to the full, but cover its rudeness and misery. Distresses, indeed, and anxieties, he may attribute to it; for it would be perfectly unnatural to suppose any condition of human life to be without them; but they must be of such a nature as not to shock the fancy with any thing peculiarly disgusting in the Pastoral life. The Shepherd may well be afflicted for the displeasure of his mistress, or for the loss of a favourite lamb. It is a sufficient recommendation of any state, to have only such evils as these to deplore. In short, it is the Pastoral life somewhat embellished and beautified, at least seen on its fairest side only, that the Poet ought to present to us. But let him take care that, in embellishing nature, he do not altogether disguise her; or pretend to join with rural simplicity and happiness, such improvements as are unnatural and foreign to it. If it be not exactly real life which he presents to us, it must, however, be somewhat that resembles it. This, in my opinion, is the general

Sæpe levi somnum suadebit inire susurro,
 Hinc altâ sub rupe canet frondator ad auras;
 Nec tamen interca, raucæ, tua cura, palumbes,
 Nec gemere aëriâ cessabit turtur ab ulmo.

Happy old man! here mid th' accustom'd streams
 And sacred springs you'll shun the scorching beams;
 While from yon willow fence, thy pasture's bound,
 The bees that suck their flowery stores around,
 Shall sweetly mingle with the whispering boughs,
 Their lulling murmurs, and invite repose.
 While from steep rocks the pruner's song is heard;
 Nor the soft cooing dove, thy fav'rite bird,
 Meanwhile shall cease to breathe her melting strain,
 Nor turtles from th' aërial elms to plain.

WARTON.

idea of Pastoral Poetry. But, in order to examine it more particularly, let us consider, first, the scenery; next, the characters; and lastly, the subjects and actions which this sort of Composition should exhibit.

As to the Scene, it is clear, that it must always be laid in the country, and much of the Poet's merit depends on describing it beautifully. Virgil is, in this respect, excelled by Theocritus, whose descriptions of natural beauties are richer, and more picturesque than those of the other.* In every Pas-

* What rural scenery, for instance, can be painted in more lively colours than the following description exhibits?

————— ἐν τε βαθύαις
 Ἄδειας σχίνιο χαμυνεσιν ἐκλειθιμῆς
 Ἐν τε νεοτμάτοισι γεγαθότες διναρῆοισι.
 Πολλάι δ' ἄμμιν ὑπερθε κατα κρατὸς δονέοντο·
 Ἄιγιεροι πτελέαι τε· το δ' ἐγγίθεν ἱερὸν ὄδωρ
 Νυμφᾶν ἐξ ἄντροιο κατειβόμενοι κελαρυσθεν.
 Τοὶ δὲ ποτι σκιεραῖς οροθαμνίσιν αὐθαλίωτες
 Τεττίγες λαλαγεῦντες ἔχον πόνον· αἱ δ' ὄλολυγαν
 Τηλόθεν ἐν πυκιναῖσι βιάτων τρέζεσκιν ἀκάνθαις.
 Ἄειδον κόρυδοι καὶ ἀκάνθιδες ἔεγε τρέγυν·
 Πῶτῶντο ξεθαὶ περὶ πίδακας ἀμφὶ μέλισσαι·
 Πᾶντ' ὥσδεν θῆρεος μαλα πίονος; ὥσδε δ' ὠπώρης·
 Ὅχνη μὲν παρ' ποσσὶ παρὰ πλευραῖσι δὲ μαλα
 Λαψιλῆως ἄμμιν ἐκυλίνδετο· τοὶ δ' ἐκεχυντο
 Ὅρπακες βρα βύλοισι καταβρίθονετς ἔρασδε.

THEOCRIT. Idyll. vii. 132.

————— on soft beds recline

Of lentisk, and young branches of the vine :
 Poplars and elms above, their foliage spread,
 Lent a cool shade, and wav'd the breezy head ;
 Below, a stream, from the nymphs sacred cave,
 In free meanders led its murm'ring wave :
 In the warm sun-beams, verdant shades among,
 Shrill grasshoppers renew'd their plaintive song ;

toral, a scene, or rural prospect, should be distinctly drawn, and set before us. It is not enough, that we have those unmeaning groupes of violets and roses, of birds, and brooks, and breezes, which our common Pastoral-mongers throw together, and which are perpetually recurring upon us without variation. A good Poet ought to give us such a landscape, as a painter could copy after. His object must be particularised: the stream, the rock, or the tree, must, each of them, stand forth, so as to make a figure in the imagination, and to give us a pleasing conception of the place where we are. A single object, happily introduced, will sometimes distinguish and characterise a whole scene; such as the antique rustic Sepulchre, a very beautiful object in a landscape; which Virgil has set before us, and which he has taken from Theocritus:

Hinc adeo media est nobis via; jamque sepulchrum
 Incipit apparere Bianoris; hic ubi densas Agricolæ stringunt frondes — *

ECL. IX.

At distance far, concealed in shades, alone,
 Sweet Philomela pour'd her tuneful moan:
 The lark, the goldfinch, warbled lays of love,
 And sweetly pensive, coo'd the turtle dove:
 While honey bees, for ever on the wing,
 Humm'd round the flowers, or sipt the silver spring,
 The rich, ripe season, gratified the sense
 With summer's sweets, and autumn's redolence.
 Apples and pears lay strew'd in heaps around,
 And the plum's loaded branches kiss'd the ground.

FAWKES.

* — To our mid journey are we come,
 I see the top of old Bianor's tomb;
 Here Mæris, where the swains thick branches prune,
 And strew their leaves, our voices let us-tune. WARTON.

Not only in professed descriptions of the scenery, but in the frequent allusions to natural objects, which occur, of course, in Pastorals, the Poet must, above all things, study variety. He must diversify his face of nature, by presenting to us new images; or otherwise, he will soon become insipid with those known topics of description, which were original, it is true, in the first Poets, who copied them from nature, but which are now worn threadbare by incessant imitation. It is also incumbent on him to suit the scenery to the subject of the Pastoral; and, according as it is of a gay or a melancholy kind, to exhibit nature under such forms as may correspond with the emotions or sentiments which he describes. Thus Virgil, in his second Eclogue, which contains the Lamentation of a despairing Lover, gives, with propriety, a gloomy appearance to the scene:

*Tantum inter densas, umbrosa cacumina, fagos,
Assiduè veniebat; ibi hæc inçondita solus
Montibus & sylvis studio jactabat inani.

With regard to the characters, or persons, which are proper to be introduced into Pastorals, it is not enough that they be persons residing in the country. The adventures, or the discourses of courtiers or citizens, in the country, are not what we look for in such Writings; we expect to be entertained by Shepherds, or persons wholly engaged in rural occupations; whose innocence and freedom from the cares of the world may, in our imagination, form an agreeable contrast

* Mid shapes of thickest beech he pin'd alone,
To the wild woods and mountains made his moan;
Still day by day, in incoherent strains,
'Twas all he could, despairing told his pains. WARTON.

with the manners and characters of those who are engaged in the bustle of life.

One of the principal difficulties which here occurs has been already hinted; that of keeping the exact medium between too much rusticity on the one hand, and too much refinement on the other. The Shepherd, assuredly, must be plain and unaffected in his manner of thinking, on all subjects. An amiable simplicity must be the ground-work of his character. At the same time, there is no necessity for his being dull and insipid. He may have good sense and reflection; he may have sprightliness and vivacity; he may have very tender and delicate feelings; since these are, more or less, the portion of men in all ranks of life; and since, undoubtedly, there was much genius in the world, before there were learning, or arts, to refine it. But then he must not subtilise; he must not deal in general reflections, and abstract reasoning; and still less in the points and conceits of an affected gallantry, which surely belong not to his character and situation. Some of these conceits are the chief blemishes of the Italian Pastorals, which are otherwise beautiful. When Aminta, in Tasso, is disentangling his Mistress's hair from the tree to which a savage had bound it, he is represented as saying: "Cruel tree! how couldst thou injure that lovely hair which did thee so much honour? thy rugged trunk was not worthy of such lovely knots. What advantage have the servants of love, if those precious chains are common to them, and to the trees?"* Such strained sentiments as these, ill

* *Gia di nodi si bei non era degno
Così rovido tronco; or che vantaggio:*

befit the woods. Rural personages are supposed to speak the language of plain sense, and natural feelings. When they describe, or relate, they do it with simplicity, and naturally allude to rural circumstances; as in those beautiful lines of one of Virgil's Eclogues :

Sepibus in nostris parvam te roscida mala
 (Dux ego vester eram) vidi cum matre legentem ;
 Alter ab undecimo tum me jam ceperat annus,
 Jam fragiles poteram a terra contingere ramos.
 Ut vidi, ut perii, ut me malus abstulit error.*

In another passage, he makes a Shepherdess throw an apple at her lover :

Tum fugit ad salices, et se cupit ante videri. †

This is naïve, as the French express it, and perfectly suited to Pastoral manners. Mr. Pope wanted to imitate this passage, and, as he thought, to improve upon it. He does it thus :

Hanno i servi d'amor, se lor commune
 E'con le piante ill pretioso laccio ?
 Pianta crudel! potesti quel bel crine
 Offender, tu, ch'a te seo tanto onore? - ATTO III. Sc. 1.

* Once with your mother to our fields you came
 For dewy apples ; thence I date my flame ;
 The choicest fruit I pointed to your view,
 Though young, my raptur'd soul was fix'd on you ;
 The boughs I just could reach with little arms ;
 But then, even then, could feel thy powerful charms.
 O, how I gaz'd, in pleasing transport tost !
 How glow'd my heart in sweet delusion lost ! WARTON.

† My Phyllis me with pelted apples plies ;
 Then, tripping to the wood, the wanton hies,
 And wishes to be seen before she flies. DRYDEN.

The sprightly Sylvia trips along the green,
She runs ; but hopes she does not run unseen ;
While a kind glance at her pursuer flies,
How much at variance are her feet and eyes !

This falls far short of Virgil ; the natural and pleasing simplicity of the description is destroyed, by the quaint and affected turn in the last line : “ How much at variance are her feet and eyes.”

Supposing the Poet to have formed correct ideas concerning his Pastoral characters and personages ; the next enquiry is, About what is he to employ them ? and what are to be the subjects of his Eclogues ? For it is not enough, that he gives us Shepherds discoursing together. Every good Poem, of every kind, ought to have a subject which should, in some way, interest us. Now, here, I apprehend, lies the chief difficulty of Pastoral Writing. The active scenes of country life either are, or to most describers appear to be, too barren of incidents. The state of a shepherd, or a person occupied in rural employments only, is exposed to few of those accidents and revolutions which render his situation interesting, or produce curiosity or surprise. The tenor of his life is uniform. His ambition is conceived to be without policy, and his love without intrigue. Hence it is, that, of all Poems, the most meagre commonly in the subject, and the least diversified in the strain, is the Pastoral. From the first lines, we can, generally, guess at all that is to follow. It is either a Shepherd who sits down solitary by a brook, to lament the absence or cruelty of his mistress, and to tell us how the trees wither, and the flowers droop, now that she is gone ; or we have two Shepherds who challenge one another to sing, rehearsing alternate verses, which have little either of meaning or subject, till the Judge rewards one with a studded crook, and another with a beechen bowl. To the frequent repetition of common-place topics, of this sort, which have been thrummed over by all Eclogue Writers since the days of Theocritus and Virgil, is owing much of that insipidity which prevails in Pastoral Compositions.

I much question, however, whether this insipidity be not owing to the fault of the Poets, and to their barren and slavish imitation of the ancient pastoral topics, rather than to the confined nature of the subject. For why may not Pastoral Poetry take a wider range? Human nature and human passions are much the same in every rank of life; and wherever these passions operate on objects that are within the rural sphere, there may be a proper subject for Pastoral. One would indeed chuse to remove from this sort of Composition the operations of violent and direful passions, and to present such only as are consistent with innocence, simplicity, and virtue. But under this limitation, there will still be abundant scope for a careful observer of nature to exert his genius. The various adventures which give occasion to those engaged in country life to display their disposition and temper; the scenes of domestic felicity or disquiet; the attachment of friends and of brothers; the rivalship and competitions of lovers; the unexpected successes or misfortunes of families, might give occasion to many a pleasing and tender incident; and were more of the narrative and sentimental intermixed with the descriptive in this kind of Poetry, it would become much more interesting than it now generally is, to the bulk of readers.*

The two great fathers of Pastoral Poetry are, Theocritus and Virgil. Theocritus was a Sicilian; and as he has laid the scene of his Eclogues in his own country, Sicily became ever afterwards a sort of consecrated ground for Pastoral Poetry. His Idyllia, as he has entitled them, are not all of equal merit; nor indeed are they all Pastorals; but some of them, poems of a quite different nature. In such, however, as are properly Pastorals, there are many and great beauties. He is distinguished for the simplicity of his sentiments; for the great sweetness and harmony of his numbers, and for the richness of his scenery and description. He is the original, of which Virgil is the imitator. For most of Virgil's highest beauties in his Eclogues are copied from Theocritus; in many places he has done nothing more than translate him. He must be allowed, however, to have imitated him with great judgment, and in some respects to have improved upon him. For Theocritus, it cannot be denied, descends sometimes into ideas that are gross and mean, and makes his shepherds abusive and immodest; whereas Virgil is free from offensive rusticity, and at the same time preserves the character of pastoral simplicity. The same distinction obtains between Theocritus and Virgil, as between many other of the Greek and Roman writers. The Greek led the way, followed nature more closely, and shewed more original genius. The Roman discovered more of the polish and correctness of art. We have a few remains of other two Greek Poets in the Pastoral Style, Moschus and Bion, which have very considerable merit; and if they want the simplicity of Theocritus, excel him in tenderness and delicacy.

* The above observations on the barrenness of the common Eclogues were written before any translation from the German had made us acquainted in this country with Gesner's Idylls, in which the ideas that had occurred to me for the improvement of Pastoral Poetry, are fully realised.

The modern writers of Pastorals have, generally, contented themselves with copying, or imitating, the descriptions and sentiments of the ancient Poets. Sannazarius, indeed, a famous Latin Poet, in the age of Leo X. attempted a bold innovation. He composed Piscatory Eclogues; changing the scene from Woods to the Sea, and from the life of Shepherds to that of Fishermen. But the innovation was so unhappy, that he has gained no followers. For the life of Fishermen is, obviously, much more hard and toilsome than that of Shepherds, and presents to the fancy much less agreeable images. Flocks, and Trees, and Flowers, are objects of greater beauty, and more generally relished by men, than fishes and marine productions. Of all the moderns, M. Gesner, a Poet of Switzerland, has been the most successful in his Pastoral Compositions. He has introduced into his Idylls (as he entitles them) many new ideas. His rural scenery is often striking, and his descriptions are lively. He presents pastoral life to us, with all the embellishments of which it is susceptible; but without any excess of refinement. What forms the chief merit of this Poet, is, that he writes to the heart; and has enriched the subject of his Idylls with incidents which give rise to much tender sentiment. Scenes of domestic felicity are beautifully painted.

The mutual affection of husbands and wives, of parents and children, of brothers and sisters, as well as of lovers, are displayed in a pleasing and touching manner. From not understanding the language in which M. Gesner writes, I can be no judge of the Poetry of his Style: but, in the subject and conduct of his Pastorals, he appears to me to have outdone all the Moderns.

Neither Mr. Pope's, nor Mr. Philips's Pastorals do any great honour to the English Poetry. Mr. Pope's were composed in his youth; which may be an apology for other faults, but cannot well excuse the barrenness that appears in them. They are written in remarkably smooth and flowing numbers: and this is their chief merit; for there is scarcely any thought in them which can be called his own; scarcely any description, or any image of nature, which has the marks of being original or copied from nature herself; but a repetition of the common images that are to be found in Virgil, and in all Poets who write of rural themes. Philips attempted to be more simple and natural than Pope; but he wanted genius to support his attempt, or to write agreeably. He, too, runs on the common and beaten topics; and endeavouring to be simple, he becomes flat and insipid. There was no small competition between these two Authors, at the time when their Pastorals were published. In some Papers of the Guardian, great partiality was shewn to Philips, and high praise bestowed upon him. Mr. Pope, resenting this preference, under a feigned name, procured a paper to be inserted in the Guardian, wherein he seemingly carries on the plan of extolling Philips; but in reality satirises him most severely with ironical praises; and, in an artful covered manner, gives the palm to himself.* About the same time, Mr. Gay published his Shepherd's Week, in Six Pastorals, which are designed to ridicule that sort of simplicity which Philips and his partisans extolled, and are, indeed, an ingenious burlesque of Pastoral Writing, when it rises no higher than the manners of modern clowns and rustics. Mr. Shenstone's Pastoral Ballad, in four parts, may justly be reckoned, I think, one of the most elegant Poems of this kind, which we have in English.

I have not yet mentioned one form in which Pastoral Writing has appeared in latter ages, that is, when extended into a Play, or regular Drama, where plot, characters, and passions, are joined with the simplicity and innocence of rural manners. This is the chief improvement which the Moderns have made on this species of Composition; and of this nature we have two Italian pieces, which are much celebrated, Guarini's Pastor Fido, and Tasso's Aminta. Both of these possess great beauties, and are entitled to the reputation they have gained. To the latter, the preference seems due, as being less intricate in the plot and conduct, and less strained and affected in the sentiments; and though not wholly free from Italian refinement (of which I already gave one instance, the worst, indeed, that occurs in all the Poem), it is, on the whole, a performance of high merit. The strain of the Poetry is gentle and pleasing; and the Italian language contributes to add much of that softness, which is peculiarly suited to Pastoral. *

* See Guardian, No. 40.

* It may be proper to take notice here, that the charge against Tasso for his points and conceits, has sometimes been carried too far. Mr. Addison, for instance, in a Paper of the Guardian, censuring his Aminta, gives this example, "That Sylvia enters adorned with a garland of flowers, and after viewing herself in a fountain, breaks out in a speech to the flowers on her head, and tells them, that she did not wear them to adorn herself, but to make them ashamed." "Whoever can bear this," he adds, "may be assured that he has no taste for Pastoral." Guard. No. 38. But Tasso's Sylvia, in truth, makes no such ridiculous figure, and we are obliged to suspect that Mr. Addison had not read the Aminta. Daphne, a companion of Sylvia, appears in conversation with Thyrsis, the confidant of Aminta, Sylvia's lover; and in order to shew him, that Sylvia was not so simple, or insensible to her own charms, as she affected to be, gives him this instance; that she had caught her one day adjusting her dress by a fountain, and applying now one flower and now another to her neck; and after comparing their colours with her own, she broke into a smile, as if she had seemed to say, I will wear you, not for my ornaments, but to shew how much you yield to me; and when caught thus admiring herself, she threw away her flowers, and blushed for shame. — This description of the vanity of a rural coquette, is no more than what is natural, and very different from what the author of the Guardian represents it.

This censure on Tasso was not originally Mr. Addison's. Bouhours, in his Manière du bien penser dans les ouvrages d'esprit, appears to have been the first who gave this misrepresentation of Sylvia's Speech, and founded a criticism on it. Fontenelle, in his Discourse on Pastoral Poetry, followed him in this criticism. Mr. Addison, or whoever was the Author of that Paper in the Guardian, copied from them both. Mr. Warton, in the Prefatory Discourse to his translation of Virgil's Eclogues, repeats the observation. Sylvia's Speech to the Flowers, with which she was adorned, is always quoted as the flagrant instance of the false taste of the Italian Poets. Whereas, Tasso gives us no such Speech of Sylvia's, but only informs us of what her companion supposed her to be thinking, or saying to herself, when she was privately admiring

I must not omit the mention of another Pastoral Drama, which will bear being brought into comparison with any composition of this kind, in any language; that is, Allan Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd.

her own beauty. After charging so many eminent Critics, for having fallen into this strange inaccuracy, from copying one another, without looking into the Author whom they censure, it is necessary for me to insert the passage which has occasioned this remark. Daphne speaks thus to Thyrsis:

Hora per dirti il ver, non mi resolvo
 Si Silvia è semplicitta, come pare
 A le parole, a gli atti. Hier vidi un segno
 Che me ne mette in dubbio. Io la trovai
 La presso la cittadè in quei gran prati,
 Ove fra stagni grace un isoletta,
 Sovra essa un lago limpidó e tranquillo,
 Tutta pèndente in atto, che pare
 Vegheggiar fe medesma, e'nsieme insieme
 Chider consiglio à l'acque, in qual maniera
 Dispor dovesse in su la fronte i crini,
 E sovra i crini il velo, e sovral velo
 I sior, che tenea in grembo; e spesso spesso
 Hor prendeva un ligustro, hor una rosa,
 E l'accostava al bel candido collo,
 A le guancie vermiglie, e de colori
 Fea paragone; e poi, ficome lieta
 De la vittoria lampeggiava un riso
 Che pareva che dicesse; io pur vi vinco;
 Ni porto voi per ornamento mio,
 Ma porto voi sol per vergogna vostra.
 Perche si veggia quanto mi cedete.
 Ma mentre ella s'ornava, e vagheggiava
 Rivolsi gli occhi a caso, e si fu accorta
 Ch'io di la m'era accorta, e vergognando,
 Rizzosi tosto, e i fior lasciò cadere:
 In tanto io piu ridea del suo rössore,
 Ella piu s'arrossia del riso mio.

AMINTA. ATTO II. Sc. ii.

It is a great disadvantage to this beautiful Poem, that it is written in the old rustic dialect of Scotland, which, in a short time, will probably be entirely obsolete, and not intelligible; and it is a further disadvantage that it is so entirely formed on the rural manners of Scotland, that none but a native of that country can thoroughly understand, or relish it. But though subject to these local disadvantages, which confine its reputation within narrow limits, it is full of so much natural description, and tender sentiments, as would do honour to any Poet. The characters are well drawn; the incidents affecting; the scenery and manners lively and just. It affords a strong proof, both of the power which nature and simplicity possess, to reach the heart in every sort of Writing; and of the variety of pleasing characters and subjects, with which Pastoral Poetry when properly managed, is capable of being enlivened.

I proceed next to treat of Lyric Poetry, or the Ode; a species of Poetical Composition which possesses much dignity, and in which many Writers have distinguished themselves, in every age. Its peculiar character is, that it is intended to be sung, or accompanied with music. Its designation implies this. Ode is, in Greek, the same with Song or Hymn; and Lyric Poetry imports, that the Verses are accompanied with a lyre, or musical instrument. This distinction was not, at first, peculiar to any one species of Poetry. For, as I observed in the last Lecture, Music and Poetry were coëval, and were, originally, always joined together. But after their separation took place, after Bards had begun to make Verse Compositions, which were to be recited or read, not to be sung, such Poems as were designed to be still joined with Music or Song, were, by way of distinction, called Odes.

In the Ode, therefore, Poetry retains its first and most ancient form; that form, under which the original Bards poured forth their enthusiastic strains, praised their Gods and their Heroes, celebrated their victories, and lamented their misfortunes. It is from this circumstance, of the Ode's being supposed to retain its original union with Music, that we are to deduce the proper idea, and the peculiar qualities of this kind of Poetry. It is not distinguished from other kinds, by the subjects on which it is employed; for these may be extremely various. I know no distinction of subject that belongs to it, except that other Poems are often employed in the recital of actions, whereas sentiments, of one kind or other, form, almost always, the subject of the Ode. But it is chiefly the spirit, the manner of its execution, that marks and characterises it. Music and Song naturally add to the warmth of Poetry. They tend to transport, in a higher degree, both the person who sings and the persons who hear. They justify, therefore, a bolder and more passionate strain, than can be supported in simple recitation. On this is formed the peculiar character of the Ode. Hence, the enthusiasm that belongs to it, and the liberties it is allowed to take, beyond any other species of Poetry. Hence, that neglect of regularity, those digressions, and that disorder which it is supposed to admit; and which, indeed, most Lyric Poets have not failed sufficiently to exemplify in their practice.

The effects of Music upon the mind are chiefly two; to raise it above its ordinary state, and fill it with high enthusiastic emotions; or to sooth, and melt it into the gentle pleasurable feelings. Hence, the Ode may either aspire to the former character of the sublime and noble, or it may descend to the latter, of the pleasant and the gay; and between these there is, also, a middle region, of the mild and temperate emotions, which the Ode may often occupy to advantage.

All Odes may be comprised under four denominations. First, Sacred Odes; Hymns addressed to God, or composed on religious subjects. Of this nature are the Psalms of David, which exhibit to us this species of Lyric Poetry in its highest degree of perfection. Secondly, Heroic Odes, which are employed in the praise of heroes, and in the celebration of martial exploits and great actions. Of this kind are all Pindar's Odes, and some few of Horace's. These two kinds ought to have sublimity and elevation for their reigning character. Thirdly, Moral and Philosophical Odes, where the sentiments are chiefly inspired by virtue, friendship, and humanity. Of this kind, are many of Horace's Odes, and several of our best modern Lyric Productions; and here the Ode possesses that middle region, which, as I observed, it sometimes occupies. Fourthly, Festive and Amorous Odes, calculated merely for pleasure and amusement. Of this nature, are all Anacreon's; some of Horace's; and a great number of songs and modern productions, that claim to be of the Lyric species. The reigning character of these, ought to be elegance, smoothness, and gaiety.

One of the chief difficulties in composing Odes, arises from that enthusiasm which is understood to be a characteristic of Lyric Poetry. A professed Ode, even of the moral kind, but more especially if it attempt the sublime, is expected to be enlivened and animated, in an uncommon degree. Full of this idea, the Poet, when he begins to write an Ode, if he has any real warmth of genius, is apt to deliver himself up to it, without controul or restraint; if he has it not, he strains after it, and thinks himself bound to assume the appearance of being all fervour, and all flame. In either case he is in great hazard of becoming extravagant. The licentiousness of writing without order, method, or connection, has infected the Ode more than any other species of Poetry. Hence, in the class of Heroic Odes, we find so few that one can read with pleasure. The Poet is out of sight in a moment. He gets up into the clouds; becomes so abrupt in his transitions; so eccentric and irregular in his motions, and of course so obscure, that we essay in vain to follow him, or to partake of his raptures. I do not require, that an Ode should be as regular in the structure of its parts, as a Didactic, or an Epic Poem. But still, in every composition, there ought to be a subject; there ought to be parts which make up a whole; there should be a connection of those parts with one another. The transitions from thought to thought may be light and delicate, such as are prompted by a lively fancy; but still they should be such as preserve the connection of ideas, and shew the author to be one who thinks, and not one who raves. Whatever authority may be pleaded for the incoherence and disorder of Lyric Poetry, nothing can be more certain, than that any composition which is so irregular in its method, as to become obscure to the bulk of Readers, is so much worse upon that account.*

The extravagant liberty which several of the modern Lyric Writers assume to themselves in the Versification, increases the disorder of this species of Poetry. They prolong their periods to such a degree, they wander through so many different measures, and employ such a variety of long and short lines, corresponding in rhyme at so great a distance from each other, that all sense of melody is utterly lost. Whereas Lyric Composition ought, beyond every other species of Poetry, to pay attention to

* “ La plupart des ceux qui parlent de l’enthousiasme de l’ode “ en parlent comme s’ils étoient aux-mêmes dans le trouble qu’ils “ veulent définir. Ce ne sont que grands mots de fureur divine, “ de transports de l’âme, de mouvemens, de lumières, qui mis “ bout-à-bout dans des phrases pompeuses, ne produisent pourtant “ aucune idée distincte. Si on les en croit, l’essence de l’enthousiasme “ est de ne pouvoir-êtré compris que par les esprits du première “ ordre, à la tête desquels ils se supposent, et dont ils “ excluent tous ceux que ôsent ne les pas entendre.—Le beau “ désordre de l’ode est un effet de l’art; mais il faut prendre “ garde de donner trop d’étendue a ce terme. On autoriserait “ par la tous les écarts imaginables. Un poète n’auroit plus qu’a “ exprimer avec force toutes les pensées qui lui viendroient suc-“ cessivement; il se tiendrait dispensé d’en examiner le rapport, “ et de se faire un plan, dont toutes les parties se pretassent “ mutuellement des beautés. Il n’y auroit ni commencement, ni “ milieu, ni fin, dans son ouvrage; et cependant l’auteur se croirait “ d’autant plus sublime, qu’il seroit moins raisonnable. Mais qui “ produiroit une pareille composition dans l’esprit du lecteur?
 “ Elle ne laisseroit qu’un étourdissement, causé par la magnifi“ cence et l’harmonie des paroles, sans y faire naître que des “ idées confuses, qui chasseroient l’une ou l’autre, au lieu de con“ courir ensemble à fixer et à éclairer l’esprit.” OEUVRES DE M.
 DE LA-MOTTE, Tome I. Discours sur l’Ode.

melody and beauty of sound; and the Versification of those Odes may be justly accounted the best, which renders the harmony of the measure most sensible to every common ear.

Pindar, the great Father of Lyric Poetry, has been the occasion of leading his imitators into some of the defects I have now mentioned. His genius was sublime; his expressions are beautiful and happy; his descriptions picturesque. But finding it a very barren subject to sing the praises of those who had gained the prize in the public games, he is perpetually digressive, and fills up his Poems with Fables of the Gods and Heroes, that have little connection either with his subject, or with one another. The ancients admired him greatly; but as many of the histories of particular families and cities to which he alludes, are now unknown to us, he is so obscure, partly from his subjects, and partly from his rapid, abrupt manner of treating them, that, notwithstanding the beauty of his expression, our pleasure in reading him is much diminished. One would imagine, that many of his modern imitators thought the best way to catch his spirit, was to imitate his disorder and obscurity. In several of the chorusses of Euripides and Sophocles, we have the same kind of Lyric Poetry as in Pindar, carried on with more clearness and connection, and at the same time with much sublimity.

Of all the writers of Odes, ancient or modern, there is none, that, in point of correctness, harmony, and happy expression, can vie with Horace. He has descended from the Pindaric rapture to a more moderate degree of elevation; and joins connected thought, and good sense, with the highest beauties of Poetry. He does not often aspire beyond that middle region, which I mentioned as belonging to the Ode; and those Odes, in which he attempts the sublime, are perhaps not always his best.* The peculiar character, in which he excels, is grace and elegance; and in this Style of Composition, no Poet has ever attained to a greater perfection than Horace. No Poet supports a moral sentiment with more dignity, touches a gay one more happily, or possesses the art of trifling more agreeably when he chuses to trifle. His language is so fortunate, that with a single word or epithet, he often conveys a whole description to the fancy. Hence he ever has been, and ever will continue to be, a favourite Author with all persons of taste.

Among the Latin Poets of later ages, there have been many imitators of Horace. One of the most distinguished is Casimir, a Polish Poet of the last century, who wrote four books of Odes. In graceful ease of expression, he is far inferior to the Roman. He oftener affects the sublime; and in the attempt, like other Lyric Writers, frequently becomes harsh and unnatural. But, on several occasions, he discovers a considerable degree of original genius, and poetical fire. Buchanan, in some of his Lyric Compositions, is very elegant and classical.

* There is no Ode whatever of Horace's, without great beauties. But though I may be singular in my opinion, I cannot help thinking that in some of those Odes which have been much admired for sublimity (such as Ode iv. Lib. 4. "Qualem ministrum fulminis alitem," &c.) there appears somewhat of a strained and forced effort to be lofty. The genius of this amiable Poet shews itself, according to my judgment, to greater advantage, in themes of a more temperate kind.

Among the French, the Odes of Jean Baptiste Rousseau have been much and justly celebrated. They possess great beauty, both of sentiment and expression. They are animated, without being rhapsodical; and are not inferior to any poetical productions in the French language.

In our own Language, we have several Lyric Compositions of considerable merit. Dryden's Ode on St. Cecilia, is well known. Mr. Gray is distinguished in some of his Odes, both for tenderness and sublimity; and in Dodsley's Miscellanies, several very beautiful Lyric Poems are to be found. As to professed Pindaric Odes, they are, with a few exceptions, so incoherent, as seldom to be intelligible. Cowley, at all times harsh, is doubly so in his Pindaric Compositions. In his Anacreontic Odes, he is much happier. They are smooth and elegant; and, indeed, the most agreeable, and the most perfect, in their kind, of all Mr. Cowley's Poems.

LECTURE XL.

DIDACTIC POETRY—DESCRIPTIVE POETRY.

HAVING treated of Pastoral and Lyric Poetry, I proceed next to Didactic Poetry; under which is included a numerous Class of Writings. The ultimate end of all Poetry, indeed of every Composition, should be, to make some useful impression on the mind. This useful impression is most commonly made in Poetry, by indirect methods; as by fable, by narration, by representation of characters; but Didactic Poetry openly professes its intention of conveying knowledge and instruction. It differs, therefore, in the form only, not in the scope and substance, from a philosophical, a moral, or a critical treatise in Prose. At the same time, by means of its form, it has several advantages over Prose Instruction. By the charm of Versification and Numbers, it renders instruction more agreeable; by the descriptions, episodes, and other embellishments, which it may interweave, it detains and engages the fancy; it fixes also useful circumstances more deeply in the memory. Hence, it is a field, wherein a Poet may gain great honour, may display both much genius, and much knowledge and judgment.

It may be executed in different manners. The Poet may chuse some instructive subject, and he may treat it regularly, and in form; or without intending a great or regular work, he may only inveigh against particular vices, or make some moral observations on human life and characters, as is commonly done in Satires and Epistles. All these come under the denomination of Didactic Poetry.

The highest species of it, is a regular treatise on some philosophical, grave, or useful subject. Of this nature we have several, both ancient and modern, of great merit and character: such as Lucretius's six Books De Rerum Natura, Virgil's Georgics, Pope's Essay on Criticism, Akenside's Pleasures of the Imagination, Armstrong on Health, Horace's, Vida's, and Boileau's Art of Poetry.

In all such works, as instruction is the professed object, the fundamental merit consists in sound thought, just principles, clear and apt illustrations. The Poet must instruct; but he must study, at the same time, to enliven his instructions, by the introduction of such figures, and such circumstances, as may amuse the imagination, may conceal the dryness of his subject, and embellish it with poetical painting. Virgil, in his Georgics, presents us here with a perfect model. He has the art of raising and beautifying the most trivial circumstances in rural life. When he is going to say, that the labour of the country must begin in spring, he expresses himself thus:

Vere novo, gelidus canis cum montibus humor
Liquitur, et Zephyro putris se gleba resolvit;
Depresso incipiat jam tum mihi Taurus aratro
Ingemere, et sulco attritus splendescere vomer.*

Instead of telling his husbandman in plain language, that his crops will fail through bad management, his language is,

Heu magnum alterius frustra spectabis acervum,
Concussaque famen in sylvis solabere quercu.†

* While yet the Spring is young, while earth unbinds
Her frozen bosom to the western winds;
While mountain snows dissolve against the Sun,
And streams yet new from precipices run;
Ev'n in this early dawning of the year,
Produce the plough and yoke the sturdy steer,
And goad him till he groans beneath his toil,
Till the bright share is buried in the soil. DRYDEN.

† On others crops you may with envy look,
And shake for food the long abandoned oak. DRYDEN.

Instead of ordering him to water his grounds, he presents us with a beautiful landscape :

Ecce supercilio clivosi tramitis undam
Elicit ; illa cadens, raucum per lævia murmur
Saxa ciet ; scatebrisque arentia temperat arva.*

In all Didactic Works, method and order is essentially requisite ; not so strict and formal as in a prose treatise ; yet such as may exhibit clearly to the Reader a connected train of instruction. Of the Didactic Poets, whom I before mentioned, Horace, in his Art of Poetry, is the one most censured for want of method. Indeed, if Horace be deficient in any thing throughout many of his Writings, it is in this, of not being sufficiently attentive to juncture and connection of parts. He writes always with ease and gracefulness ; but often in a manner somewhat loose and rambling. There is, however, in that work, much good sense and excellent criticism ; and, if it be considered as intended for the regulation of the Roman Drama, which seems to have been the Author's chief purpose, it will be found to be a more complete and regular Treatise, than under the common notion of its being a System of the whole Poetical Art.

With regard to Episodes and Embellishments,

* Behold when burning suns, or Syrius' beams
Strike fiercely on the field and withering stems,
Down from the summit of the neighbouring hills,
O'er the smooth stones he calls the bubbling rills ;
Soon as he clears whate'er their passage stay'd,
And marks their future current with his spade,
Before him scattering they prevent his pains,
And roll with hollow murmurs o'er the plains. WARTON.

great liberty is allowed to Writers of Didactic Poetry. We soon tire of a continued series of instructions, especially in a poetical work, where we look for entertainment. The great art of rendering a Didactic Poem interesting, is to relieve and amuse the Reader, by connecting some agreeable Episodes with the principal subject. These are always the parts of the work which are best known, and which contribute most to support the reputation of the Poet. The principal beauties of Virgil's Georgics lie in digressions of this kind, in which the Author has exerted all the force of his genius; such as the prodigies that attended the death of Julius Cæsar, the Praises of Italy, the Happiness of a Country Life, the Fable of Aristeus, and the moving Tale of Orpheus and Eurydice. In like manner, the favourite passages in Lucretius's work, and which alone could render such a dry and abstract subject tolerable in Poetry, are the Digressions on the Evils of Superstition, the Praise of Epicurus and his Philosophy, the Description of the Plague, and several other incidental illustrations, which are remarkably elegant, and adorned with a sweetness and harmony of Versification peculiar to that Poet. There is indeed nothing in Poetry so entertaining or descriptive, but what a Didactic Writer of genius may be allowed to introduce in some part of his work; provided always, that such Episodes arise naturally from the main subject; that they be not disproportioned in length to it; and that the Author know how to descend with propriety to the plain, as well as how to rise to the bold and figured Style.

Much art may be shewn by a Didactic Poet, in connecting his Episodes happily with his subject.

Virgil is also distinguished for his address in this point. After seeming to have left his husbandmen, he again returns to them very naturally, by laying hold of some rural circumstance, to terminate his digression. Thus, having spoken of the battle of Pharsalia, he subjoins immediately, with much art :

Scilicet et tempus veniet, cum finibus illis,
Agricolo, incurve terram molitus aratro.
Exesa inveniet scabrâ rubiginè pila :
Aut gravibus rastris galeas pulsabit inanes,
Grandiaque effosis mirabitur ossa sepulchris.*

In English, Dr. Akenside has attempted the most rich and poetical form of Didactic Writing, in his Pleasures of the Imagination; and though, in the execution of the whole, he is not equal, he has, in several parts, succeeded happily, and displayed much genius. Dr. Armstrong, in his Art of Preserving Health, has not aimed at so high a strain as the other; but he is more equal, and maintains throughout a chaste and correct elegance.

Satires and Epistles naturally run into a more familiar Style, than solemn Philosophical Poetry. As the manners and characters which occur in ordinary life, are their subject, they require being treated with somewhat of the ease and freedom of conversation; and hence it is commonly the “musa pedestris,” which reigns in such Compositions.

* Then, after length of time, the lab'ring swains
Who turn the turf of these unhappy plains,
Shall rusty arms from the plough'd furrows take,
And over empty helmets pass the rake;
Amus'd at antique titles on the stones,
And mighty relics of gigantic bones.

Satire, in its first state among the Romans, had a form different from what it afterwards assumed. Its origin is obscure, and has given occasion to altercation among Critics. It seems to have been at first a relic of the Ancient Comedy, written partly in prose, partly in Verse, and abounding with scurrility. Ennius and Lucilius corrected its grossness; and, at last, Horace brought it into that form, which now gives the denomination to Satirical Writing. Reformation of manners is the end which it professes to have in view; and in order to this end, it assumes the liberty of boldly censuring vice and vicious characters. It has been carried on in three different manners, by the three great Ancient Satirists, Horace, Juvenal, and Persius. Horace's Style has not much elevation. He entitles his Satires, "Sermones," and seems not to have intended rising much higher than Prose put into numbers. His manner is easy and graceful. They are rather the follies and weaknesses of mankind, than their enormous vices, which he chuses for the object of his Satire. He reproveth with a smiling aspect; and while he moralizes like a sound Philosopher, discovers, at the same time, the politeness of a courtier. Juvenal is much more serious and declamatory. He has more strength and fire, and more elevation of Style, than Horace; but is greatly inferior to him in gracefulness and ease. His Satire is more zealous, more sharp and pointed, as being generally directed against more flagitious characters. As Scaliger says of him, "ardet, instat, jugulat," whereas Horace's character is "admissus circum præcordia ludit." Persius has a greater resemblance of the force and fire of Juvenal, than of the politeness of Horace. He is distinguished for sentiments of noble and sublime morality. He is a nervous and lively Writer; but withal, often harsh and obscure.

Poetical Epistles, when employed on moral or critical subjects, seldom rise into a higher strain of Poetry than Satires. In the form of an Epistle, indeed, many other subjects may be handled, and either Love Poetry, or Elegiac, may be carried on; as in Ovid's Epistolæ Herodium, and his Epistolæ de Ponto. Such works as these are designed to be merely sentimental; and as their merit consists in being proper expressions of the passion or sentiment which forms the subject, they may assume any tone of Poetry that is suited to it. But Didactic Epistles, of which I now speak, seldom admit of much elevation. They are commonly intended as observations on Authors, or on Life and characters; in delivering which, the Poet does not purpose to compose a formal treatise, or to confine himself strictly to regular method, but gives scope to his genius on some particular theme which, at the time, has prompted him to write. In all Didactic Poetry of this kind, it is an important rule, "quicquid precipes, esto brevis." Much of the grace, both of Satirical and Epistolary Writing, consists in a spirited conciseness. This gives to such composition an edge and a liveliness, which strike the fancy and keep attention awake. Much of their merit depends also on just and happy representations of characters. As they are not supported by those high beauties of descriptive and poetical language which adorn other compositions, we expect, in return, to be entertained with lively paintings of men and manners, which are always pleasing; and in these, a certain sprightliness and turn of wit finds its proper place. The higher species of Poetry seldom admit it; but here it is seasonable and beautiful.

In all these respects, Mr. Pope's Ethical Epistles deserve to be mentioned with signal honour, as a model, next to perfect, of this kind of Poetry. Here, perhaps, the strength of his genius appeared. In the more sublime parts of Poetry he is not so distinguished. In the enthusiasm, the fire, the force and copiousness of poetic genius, Dryden, though a much less correct Writer, appears to have been superior to him. One can scarce think that he was capable of Epic or Tragic Poetry; but, within a certain limited region, he has been outdone by no Poet. His translation of the Iliad will remain a lasting monument to his honour, as the most elegant and highly finished translation that, perhaps, ever was given of any poetical work. That he was not incapable of tender Poetry, appears from the Epistle of Eloisa to Abelard, and from the Verses to the Memory of an unfortunate Lady, which are almost his only sentimental productions; and which indeed are excellent in their kind. But the qualities for which he is chiefly distinguished are, judgment and wit, with a concise and happy expression, and a melodious versification. Few Poets ever had more wit, and at the same time more judgment, to direct the proper employment of that wit. This renders his Rape of the Lock the greatest master-piece that perhaps was ever composed, in the gay and sprightly Style; and in his serious works, such as his Essay on Man, and his Ethic Epistles, his wit just discovers itself as much, as to give a proper seasoning to grave reflections. His imitations of Horace are so peculiarly happy, that one is at a loss, whether most to admire the original, or the copy; and they are among the few imitations extant, that have all the grace and ease of an original. His paintings of characters are natural and lively in a high degree; and never was any Writer so happy in that concise spirited Style, which gives animation to Satires and Epistles. We are never so sensible of the good effects of rhyme in English verse, as in reading these parts of his works. We see it adding to the Style, an elevation which otherwise it could not have possessed; while at the same time he manages it so artfully, that it never appears in the least to encumber him; but on the contrary, serves to increase the liveliness of his manner. He tells us himself, that he could express moral observations more concisely, and therefore more forcibly, in rhyme, than he could do in Prose.

Among Moral and Didactic Poets, Dr. Young is of too great eminence to be passed over without notice. In all his works, the marks of strong genius appear. His Universal Passion, possesses the full merit of that animated conciseness of Style, and lively description of characters, which I mentioned as particularly requisite in Satirical and Didactic Compositions. Though his wit may often be thought too sparkling, and his sentences too pointed, yet the vivacity of his fancy is so great, as to entertain every Reader. In his Night Thoughts, there is much energy of expression; in the three first, there are several pathetic passages; and scattered through them all, happy images and allusions, as well as pious reflections, occur. But the sentiments are frequently overstrained, and turgid; and the Style is too harsh and obscure to be pleasing. Among French Authors, Boileau has undoubtedly much merit in Didactic Poetry. Their later Critics are unwilling to allow him any great share of original genius, or poetic fire.* But his Art of Poetry, his Satires and Epistles, must ever be esteemed eminent, not only for solid and judicious thought, but for correct and elegant poetical expression, and fortunate imitation of the Ancients.

From Didactic, I proceed next to treat of Descriptive Poetry, where the highest exertions of genius may be displayed. By Descriptive Poetry, I do not mean any one particular species or form of Composition. There are few Compositions of any length, that can be called purely descriptive, or wherein the Poet proposes to himself no other object but merely to describe, without employing narration, action, or moral sentiment, as the ground-work of his piece. Description is generally introduced as an embellishment, rather than made the subject of a regular work. But though it seldom form a separate species of writing, yet into every species of Poetical Composition, Pastoral, Lyric, Didactic, Epic, and Dramatic, it both enters and possesses in each of them a very considerable place; so that in treating of Poetry, it demands no small attention.

Description is the great test of a Poet's imagination, and always distinguishes an original from a second-rate genius. To a Writer of the inferior class, Nature, when at any time he attempts to describe it, appears exhausted by those who have gone before him in the same tract. He sees nothing new, or peculiar, in the object which he would paint; his conceptions of it are loose and vague; and his expressions, of course, feeble and general. He give us words rather than ideas; we meet with the language indeed of Poetical Description, but we apprehend the object described very indistinctly. Whereas a true Poet makes us imagine that we see it before our eyes; he catches the distinguishing features; he gives it the colours of life and reality; he places it in such a light that a painter could copy after him. This happy talent is chiefly owing to a strong imagination, which first receives a lively impression of the object; and then, by employing a proper selection of circumstances in describing it, transmits that impression in its full force to the imagination of others.

* Vid. Poétique Française de Marmontel.

In this selection of circumstances, lies the great art of Picturesque Description. In the first place, they ought not to be vulgar, and common ones, such as are apt to pass by without remark; but, as much as possible, new and original, which may catch the fancy, and draw attention. In the next place, they ought to be such as particularize the object described, and mark it strongly. No description that rests in generals can be good. For we can conceive nothing clearly in the abstract; all distinct ideas are formed upon particulars. In the third place, all the circumstances employed ought to be uniform, and of a piece: that is, when describing a great object, every circumstance brought into view should tend to aggrandize; or, when describing a gay and pleasant one, should tend to beautify, that, by this means, the impression may rest upon the imagination, complete and entire; and lastly, the circumstances in description should be expressed with conciseness, and with simplicity; for when either too much exaggerated, or too long dwelt upon and extended, they never fail to enfeeble the impression that is designed to be made. Brevity, almost always, contributes to vivacity. These general rules will be best understood by illustrations founded on particular instances.

Of all professed Descriptive Compositions, the largest and fullest that I am acquainted with, in any language, is Mr. Thomson's Seasons; a work which possesses very uncommon merit. The style, in the midst of much splendour and strength, is sometimes harsh, and may be censured as deficient in ease and distinctness. But notwithstanding this defect, Thomson is a strong and beautiful Describer: for he had a feeling heart, and a warm imagination. He had studied and copied Nature with care. Enamoured of her beauties, he not only described them properly, but felt their impression with strong sensibility. The impression which he felt, he transmits to his Readers; and no person of taste can peruse any one of his Seasons, without having the ideas and feelings which belong to that Season, recalled, and rendered present to his mind. Several instances of most beautiful description might be given from him; such as, the shower in Spring, the morning in Summer, and the man perishing in snow in Winter. But at present, I shall produce a passage of another kind, to shew the power of a single well-chosen circumstance, to heighten a description. In his Summer, relating the effects of heat in the torrid zone, he is led to take notice of the Pestilence that destroyed the English fleet, at Carthagena, under Admiral Vernon; when he has the following lines:

——— you, gallant Vernon, saw
 The miserable scene; you pitying saw
 To infant weakness sunk the warrior's arms;
 Saw the deep racking pang; the ghastly form;
 The lip pale quiv'ring; and the beamless eye
 No more with ardour bright; you heard the groans
 Of agonizing ships from shore to shore;
 Heard nightly plunged, amid the sullen waves,
 The frequent corse. ——— L. 1050.

All the circumstances here are properly chosen, for setting this dismal scene in a strong light before our eyes. But what is most striking in the picture, is the last image. We are conducted through all the scenes of distress, till we come to the mortality prevailing in the fleet, which a vulgar Poet would have described by exaggerated expressions, concerning the multiplied trophies and victories of death. But, how much more is the imagination impressed by this single circumstance, of dead bodies, thrown overboard every night; of the constant sound of their falling into the waters; and of the Admiral listening to this melancholy sound, so often striking his ear?

Heard nightly plunged, amid the sullen waves,
 The frequent corse.*

* The eulogium which Dr. Johnson, in his Lives of the Poets, gives of Thomson, is high, and, in my opinion, very just; "As " a writer, he is entitled to one praise of the highest kind; his
 " mode of thinking, and of expressing his thoughts, is original.
 " His Blank Verse is no more the Blank Verse of Milton, or of " any other Poet, than the Rhimes of Prior are the Rhimes of " Cowley. His numbers, his pauses, his diction, are of his own " growth, without transcription, without imitation. He thinks in " a peculiar train, and he thinks always as a man of genius. He " looks round on nature and life, with the eye which nature
 " bestows only on a Poet; the eye that distinguishes in every

Mr. Parnell's Tale of the Hermit is conspicuous, throughout the whole of it, for beautiful Descriptive Narration. The manner of the Hermit's setting forth to visit the world; his meeting with a companion, and the houses in which they are successively entertained, of the vain man, the covetous man, and the good man, are pieces of very fine painting, touched with a light and delicate pencil, overcharged with no superfluous colouring, and conveying to us a lively idea of the objects. But of all the English Poems in the Descriptive Style, the richest and most remarkable are Milton's Allegro and Penseroso. The collection of gay images on the one hand, and of melancholy ones on the other, exhibited in these two small but inimitably fine Poems, are as exquisite as can be conceived. They are, indeed, the storehouse whence many succeeding Poets have enriched their “ thing presented to its view, whatever there is on which imagination can delight to be detained; and with a mind that at once comprehends the vast and attends to the minute. The Reader of the Seasons wonders that he never saw before what Thomson shews him, and that he never yet has felt what Thomson impresses. His descriptions of extended scenes, and general effects, bring before us the whole magnificence of nature, whether pleasing or dreadful. The gaiety of Spring, the splendour of Summer, the tranquillity of Autumn, and the horror of Winter, take, in their turn, possession of the mind. The Poet leads us through the appearances of things, as they are successively varied by the vicissitudes of the year, and imparts to us so much of his own enthusiasm, that our thoughts expand with his imagery, and kindle with his sentiments.” The censure which the same eminent critic passes upon Thomson's diction, is no less just and well founded, that “ it is too exuberant, and may sometimes be charged with filling the ear more than the mind.”

descriptions of similar subjects; and they alone are sufficient for illustrating the observations which I made concerning the proper selection of circumstances in Descriptive Writing. Take, for instance, the following passage from the Penseroso :

— I walk unseen
 On the dry, smooth-shaven green,
 To behold the wandering Moon,
 Riding near her highest noon,
 Like one that had been led astray
 Through the Heaven's wide pathless way,
 And oft as if her head she bow'd,
 Stooping thro' a fleecy cloud.
 Oft, on a plat of rising ground,
 I hear the far-off curfew sound,
 Over some wide watered shore,
 Swinging slow with solemn roar :
 Or, if the air will not permit,
 Some still removed place will fit,
 Where glowing embers through the room
 Teach light to counterfeit a gloom ;
 Far from all resort of mirth,
 Save the cricket on the hearth,
 Or the bellman's drowsy charm,
 To bless the doors from nightly harm ;
 Or let my lamp at midnight hour,
 Be seen in some high lonely tower,
 Where I may outwatch the Bear
 With thrice great Hermes, or unsphere
 The spirit of Plato to unfold
 What worlds or what vast regions hold
 Th' immortal mind, that hath forsook
 Her mansion in his fleshy nook ;
 And of those Dæmons that are found
 In fire, air, flood, or under-ground.

Here, there are no unmeaning general expressions; all is particular; all is picturesque; nothing forced or exaggerated; but a simple style, and a collection of strong expressive images, which are all of one class, and recal a number of similar ideas of the melancholy kind: particularly the walk by moonlight; the sound of the curfew-bell heard distant; the dying embers in the chamber; the bellman's call; and the lamp seen at midnight in the high lonely tower. We may observe too, the conciseness of the Poet's manner. He does not rest long on one circumstance, or employ a great many words to describe it; which always makes the impression faint and languid; but placing it in one strong point of view, full and clear before the Reader, he there leaves it.

“From his shield and his helmet,” says Homer, describing one of his heroes in battle, “From his shield and his helmet, there sparkled an incessant blaze; like the autumnal star, when it appears in its brightness from the waters of the ocean.” This is short and lively: but when it comes into Mr. Pope's hand, it evaporates in three pompous lines, each of which repeats the same image in different words;

High on his helm celestial lightnings play,
His beamy shield emits a living ray;
Th' unwearied blaze incessant streams supplies
Like the red star that fires th' autumnal skies.

It is to be observed, in general, that, in describing solemn or great objects, the concise manner is, almost always, proper. Descriptions of gay and smiling scenes can bear to be more amplified and prolonged; as strength is not the predominant quality expected in these. But where a sublime or a pathetic impression is intended to be made, energy is above all things required. The imagination ought then to be seized at once; and it is far more deeply impressed by one strong and ardent image, than by the anxious minuteness of laboured illustration. — “His face was without form, and dark,” says Ossian, describing a ghost; “the stars dim twinkling through his form; thrice he sighed over the hero; and thrice the winds of the night roared around.”

It deserves attention too, that in describing inanimate natural objects, the Poet, in order to enliven his description, ought always to mix living beings with them. The scenes of dead and still life are apt to pall upon us, if the Poet do not suggest sentiments, and introduce life and action into his description. This is well known to every Painter who is a master of his art. Seldom has any beautiful landscape been drawn, without some human being represented on the canvas, as beholding it, or on some account concerned in it.

Hic gelidi fontes, hic mollia prata Lycori,
Hic nemus; hic ipso tecum consumerer ævo.*

The touching part of these fine lines of Virgil's is the last, which sets before us the interest of two lovers in this rural scene. A long description of the “fontes,” the “nemus,” and the “prata,” in the most poetical modern manner, would have been insipid without this stroke, which, in a few words, brings home to the heart all the beauties of the place: “hic ipso tecum consumerer ævo,” It is a great

* Here cooling fountains roll thro' flow'ry meads;
Here woods, Lycoris, lift their verdant heads;
Here could I wear my careless life away,
And in thy arms insensibly decay. VIRG. Ecl. X. WARTON.

beauty in Milton's Allegro, that it is all alive and full of persons.

Every thing, as I before said, in description, should be as marked and particular as possible, in order to imprint on the mind a distinct and complete image. A hill, a river, or a lake, rises up more conspicuous to the fancy, when some particular lake, or river, or hill, is specified, than when the terms are left general. Most of the Ancient Writers have been sensible of the advantage which this gives to description. Thus, in that beautiful Pastoral Composition, the Song of Solomon, the images are commonly particularised by the objects to which they allude. "It is the rose of Sharon; the lily of the valleys; the flock which feeds on Mount Gilead; the stream which comes from Mount Lebanon. Come with me, from Lebanon, my Spouse; look from the top of Amana, from the top of Shenir and Hermon, from the mountains of the Leopards." Ch. iv. 8. So Horace:

Quid dedicatum poscit Apollinem
Vates? quid orat de patera novum
Fundens liquorem? non opimas
Sardinæ segetes feracis;
Non æstuosæ grata Calabriæ
Armenta; non aurum aut ebur Indicum,
Non rura, quæ Liris quietâ
Mordet aquâ, taciturnus amnis.*

Lib. 1. Ode 31.

* When at Apollo's hallowed shrine
The poet hails the pow'r divine,
And here his first libation pours,
What is the blessing he implores?
He nor desires the swelling grain,
That yellow o'er Sardinia's plain,
Nor the fair herds that lowing feed

Both Homer and Virgil are remarkable for the talent of Poetical Description. In Virgil's Second Æneid, where he describes the burning and sacking of Troy, the particulars are so well selected and presented, that the Reader finds himself in the midst of that scene of horror. The death of Priam, especially, may be singled out as a master-piece of description. All the circumstances of the aged monarch arraying himself in armour, when he finds the enemy making themselves masters of the city; his meeting with his family, who are taking shelter at an altar in the court of the palace, and their placing him in the midst of them; his indignation when he beholds Pyrrhus slaughtering one of his sons; the feeble dart which he throws; with Pyrrhus's brutal behaviour, and his manner of putting the old man to death, are painted in the most affecting manner, and with a masterly hand. All Homer's battles, and Milton's account, both of Paradise and of the Infernal Regions, furnish many beautiful instances of Poetical Description. Ossian, too, paints in strong and lively colours, though he employs few circumstances; and his chief excellency lies in painting to the heart. One of his fullest Descriptions is, the following of the ruins of Balclutha: " I have seen the walls of Balclutha, but " they were desolate. The fire had resounded with" in the halls; and the voice of the people is now
" heard no more. The stream of Clutha was re-

On warm Calabria's flowery mead ;
Nor ivory of spotless shine ;
Nor gold forth flaming from the mine ;
Nor the rich fields that Liris laves,
And eats away with silent waves.

FRANCIS.

“ moved from its place by the fall of the walls ;
 “ the thistle shook there its lonely head ; the moss “ whistled to the wind. The fox looked out at “ the window ; the rank grass waved round his head.
 “ Desolate is the dwelling of Moina. Silence is in “ the house of her fathers.” Shakespeare cannot be omitted on this occasion, as singularly eminent for painting with the pencil of nature. Though it be in manners and characters that his chief excellency lies, yet his scenery also is often exquisite, and happily described by a single stroke, as in that fine line of the “ Merchant of Venice,” which conveys to the fancy as natural and beautiful an image as can possibly be exhibited in so few words :

How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank !
 Here will we sit, &c.

Much of the beauty of Descriptive Poetry depends upon a right choice of Epithets. Many Poets, it must be confessed, are too careless in this particular. Epithets are frequently brought in merely to complete the verse, or make the rhyme answer ; and hence they are so unmeaning and redundant ; expletive words only, which, in place of adding any thing to the description, clog and enervate it. Virgil’s “ Liquidi fontes,” and Horace’s “ Prata canis albicant pruinis,” must, I am afraid, be assigned to this class ; for, to denote by an epithet that water is liquid, or that snow is white, is no better than mere tautology. Every epithet should either add a new idea to the word which it qualifies, or at least serve to raise and heighten its known signification. So in Milton,

— Who shall attempt with wandering feet
 The dark, unbottom'd infinite abyss,
 And through the palpable obscure, find out
 His uncouth way? or spread his airy flight,
 Upborn with indefatigable wings,
 Over the vast abrupt?

B. II.

The epithets employed here plainly add strength to the description, and assist the fancy in conceiving it; — the wandering feet — the unbottomed abyss — the palpable obscure — the uncouth way — the indefatigable wing — serve to render the images more complete and distinct. But there are many general epithets, which, though they appear to raise the signification of the word to which they are joined, yet leave it so undetermined, and are now become so trite and beaten in poetical language, as to be perfectly insipid. Of this kind are “barbarous discord — hateful envy — mighty chiefs — bloody war — gloomy shades — direful scenes,” and a thousand more of the same kind which we meet with occasionally in good Poets; but with which Poets of inferior genius abound every where, as the great props of their affected sublimity. They give a sort of swell to the language, and raise it above the tone of prose; but they serve not in the least to illustrate the object described; on the contrary, they load the Style with a languid verbosity.

Sometimes it is in the power of a Poet of genius, by one well-chosen epithet, to accomplish a description, and by means of a single word, to paint a whole scene to the fancy. We may remark this effect of an epithet in the following fine lines of Milton's Lycidas:

Where were ye, Nymphs, when the remorseless deep Clos'd o'er the head of your lov'd Lycidas?
 For neither were ye playing on the steep,
 Where your old bards, the famous Druids, lie,
 Nor on the shaggy top of Mona high,
 Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream.

Among these wild scenes, "Deva's wizard stream" is admirably imaged; by this one word, presenting to the fancy all the romantic ideas, of a river floating through a desolate country, with banks haunted by wizards and enchanters. Akin to this is an epithet which Horace gives to the river Hydaspes. A good man, says he, stands in need of no arms:

Sive per Syrtes iter æstuosas,
 Sive facturus per inhospitalem
 Caucasum; vel quæ loca fabulosus Lambit Hydaspes.*

This epithet "fabulosus" one of the commentators on Horace has changed into "sabulosus" or sandy; substituting, by a strange want of taste, the common and trivial epithet of the sandy river, in place of that beautiful picture which the Poet gives us, by calling Hydaspes the Romantic River, or the scene of Adventures and Poetic Tales.

Virgil has employed an epithet with great beauty and propriety, when accounting for Dædalus not having engraved the fortune of his son Icarus:

* Whether through Lybia's burning sands
 Our journey leads, or Scythia's lands,
 Amidst th' inhospitable waste of snows,
 Or where the fabulous Hydaspes flows.

Bis conatus erat casus effingere in auro,
 Bis patriæ cecidère manus.*

ÆN. VI.

These instances, and observations, may give some just idea of true poetical description. We have reason always to distrust an Author's descriptive talents, when we find him laborious and turgid, amassing common-place epithets and general expressions, to work up a high conception of some object, of which, after all, we can form but an indistinct idea. The best describers are simple and concise. They set before us such features of an object, as, on the first view, strike and warm the fancy: they give us ideas which a Statuary or a Painter could lay hold of, and work after them; which is one of the strongest and most decisive trials of the real merit of Description.

LECTURE XLI.

THE POETRY OF THE HEBREWS.

AMONG the various kinds of Poetry, which we are, at present, employed in examining, the Ancient

* Here hapless Icarus had found his part,
 Had not the father's grief restrain'd his art;
 He twice essay'd to cast his son in gold,
 Twice from his hand he drop'd the forming mould.

DRYDEN.

In this translation the thought is justly given; but the beauty of the expression "patriæ manus," which in the original conveys the thought with so much tenderness, is lost.

Hebrew Poetry, or that of the Scriptures, justly deserves a place. Viewing these sacred books in no higher light, than as they present to us the most ancient monuments of Poetry extant at this day in the world, they afford a curious object of Criticism. They display the taste of a remote age and country. They exhibit a species of Composition, very different from any other with which we are acquainted, and, at the same time, beautiful. Considered as Inspired Writings, they give rise to discussions of another kind. But it is our business, at present, to consider them not in a theological, but in a critical view: and it must needs give pleasure, if we shall find the beauty and dignity of the Composition adequate to the weight and importance of the matter. Dr. Lowth's learned Treatise, "De Sacra Poësi Hebræorum," ought to be perused by all who desire to become thoroughly acquainted with this subject. It is a work exceedingly valuable, both for the elegance of its composition, and for the justness of the criticism which it contains. In this Lecture, as I cannot illustrate the subject with more benefit to the Reader, than by following the tract of that ingenious Author, I shall make much use of his observations.

I need not spend many words in showing, that among the books of the Old Testament there is such an apparent diversity in Style, as sufficiently discovers, which of them are to be considered as Poetical, and which, as Prose Compositions. While the historical books, and legislative writings of Moses, are evidently Prosaic in the composition, the Book of Job, the Psalms of David, the Song of Solomon, the Lamentations of Jeremiah, a great part of the Prophetical Writings, and several passages scattered occasionally through the historical books, carry the most plain and distinguishing marks of Poetical Writing.

There is not the least reason for doubting, that originally these were written in verse, or some kind of measured numbers; though as the ancient pronunciation of the Hebrew Language is now lost, we are not able to ascertain the nature of the Hebrew verse, or at most can ascertain it but imperfectly. Concerning this point there have been great controversies among learned men, which it is unnecessary to our present purpose to discuss. Taking the Old Testament in our own Translation, which is extremely literal, we find plain marks of many parts of the original being written in a measured Style; and the "disjecta membra poëtæ" often shew themselves. Let any person read the Historical Introduction to the book of Job, contained in the first and second chapters, and then go on to Job's speech in the beginning of the third chapter, and he cannot avoid being sensible, that he passes all at once from the region of prose to that of Poetry. Not only the poetical sentiments, and the figured Style, warn him of the change; but the cadence of the sentence, and the arrangement of the words, are sensibly altered; the change is as great as when he passes from reading Cæsar's Commentaries, to read Virgil's Æneid. This is sufficient to shew that the Sacred Scriptures contain what must be called poetry in the strictest sense of that word; and I shall afterwards shew, that they contain instances of most of the different forms of Poetical Writing. It may be proper to remark, in passing, that hence arises a most invincible argument in honour of Poetry. No person can imagine that to be a frivolous and contemptible art, which has been employed by Writers under divine inspiration, and has been chosen as a proper channel for conveying to the world the knowledge of divine truth.

From the earliest times, Music and Poetry were cultivated among the Hebrews. In the days of the Judges, mention is made of the Schools or Colleges of the Prophets; where one part of the employment of the persons trained in such schools was, to sing the praises of God, accompanied with various instruments. In the first book of Samuel (chap. x. 7.) we find, on a public occasion, a company of these Prophets coming down from the hill where their school was, "prophesying," it is said, "with the psaltery, tabret, and harp before them." But in the days of King David, Music and Poetry were carried to their greatest height. For the service of the tabernacle, he appointed four thousand Levites, divided into twenty-four courses, and marshalled under several leaders, whose sole business it was to sing Hymns, and to perform the instrumental Music in the public worship. Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun, were the chief directors of the Music; and, from the titles of some Psalms, it would appear that they were also eminent composers of Hymns or Sacred Poems. In chapter xxv. of the first book of Chronicles, an account is given of David's institutions, relating to the Sacred Music and Poetry; which were certainly more costly, more splendid and magnificent, than ever obtained in the public service of any other nation.

The general construction of the Hebrew Poetry is of a singular nature, and peculiar to itself. It consists in dividing every period into correspondent, for the most part into equal members, which answer to one another, both in sense and sound. In the first member of the period a sentiment is expressed; and in the second member, the same sentiment is amplified, or is repeated in different terms, or sometimes contrasted with its opposite; but in such a manner that the same structure and nearly the same number of words is preserved. This is the general strain of all the Hebrew Poetry. Instances of it occur every where on opening the Old Testament. Thus, in Psalm xcvi. "Sing unto the Lord a new song — Sing unto the Lord, all the earth. Sing unto the Lord, and bless his name — shew forth his salvation from day to day. Declare his glory among the heathen — his wonders among all the people. For the Lord is great, and greatly to be praised — He is to be feared above all the Gods. Honour and majesty are before him — Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary." It is owing, in a great measure, to this form of Composition that our version, though in Prose, retains so much of a poetical cast. For the version being strictly word for word after the original, the form and order of the original sentence are preserved; which by this artificial structure, this regular alternation and correspondence of parts, makes the ear sensible of a departure from the common Style and Tone of Prose.

The origin of this form of Poetical Composition among the Hebrews, is clearly to be deduced from the manner in which their Sacred Hymns were wont to be sung. They were accompanied with music, and they were performed by choirs or bands of singers and musicians, who answered alternately to each other. When, for instance, one band began the Hymn thus: "The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice;" the chorus, or semi-chorus, took up the corresponding versicle, "Let the multitude of the isles be glad thereof."—"Clouds and darkness are round about him," sung the one; the other replied, "Judgment and righteousness are the habitation of his throne." And in this manner their Poetry, when set to music, naturally divided itself into a succession of strophes and antistrophes correspondent to each other; whence, it is probable, the Antiphon, or Responsory, in the public religious service of so many Christian churches, derived its origin.

We are expressly told, in the book of Ezra, that the Levites sung in this manner: "Alternatim," or by course (Ezra, iii. 11.); and some of David's Psalms bear plain marks of their being composed in order to be thus performed. The 24th Psalm, in particular, which is thought to have been composed on the great and solemn occasion of the Ark of the Covenant being brought back to Mount Zion, must have had a noble effect when performed after this manner, as Dr. Lowth has illustrated it. The whole people are supposed to be attending the procession. The Levites and Singers, divided into their several courses, and accompanied with all their musical Instruments, led the way. After the Introduction to the Psalm, in the two first verses, when the procession begins to ascend the sacred Mount, the question is put, as by a semi-chorus, "Who shall ascend unto the hill of the Lord, and who shall stand in his holy place?" The response is made by the full chorus with the greatest dignity: "He that hath clean hands and a pure heart; who hath “ not lifted up his soul to vanity, nor sworn deceitfully.” As the procession approaches to the doors of the Tabernacle, the chorus, with all their instruments, join in this exclamation: “ Lift up your heads, ye gates, and be ye lifted up; ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in.” Here the semi-chorus plainly breaks in, as with a lower voice, “ Who is this King of Glory?” and at the moment when the Ark is introduced into the Tabernacle, the response is made by the burst of the whole chorus: “ The Lord, strong and mighty; the Lord, mighty in battle.” I take notice of this instance the rather, as it serves to shew how much of the grace and magnificence of the Sacred Poems, as indeed of all Poems, depends upon our knowing the particular occasions for which they were composed, and the particular circumstances to which they were adapted; and how much of this beauty must now be lost to us, through our imperfect acquaintance with many particulars of the Hebrew history, and Hebrew rites.

The method of Composition which has been explained, by correspondent versicles being universally introduced into the Hymns or musical Poetry of the Jews, easily spread itself through their other Poetical Writings, which were not designed to be sung in alternate portions, and which therefore did not so much require this mode of Composition. But the mode became familiar to their ears, and carried with it a certain solemn majesty of Style, particularly suited to sacred subjects. Hence, throughout the Prophetical Writings, we find it prevailing as much as in the Psalms of David; as, for instance, in the Prophet Isaiah (chap. xl. 1.) “ Arise, shine, for thy “ light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen

 “ upon thee : For, lo ! darkness shall cover the earth,
 “ and gross darkness the people. But the Lord “ shall rise upon thee, and his glory shall be seen “ upon thee, and the Gentiles shall come to thy “ light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising.”
 This form of writing is one of the great characteristics of the ancient Hebrew Poetry ; very different from,
 and even opposite to, the Style of the Greek and Roman Poets.

Independently of this peculiar mode of construction, the Sacred Poetry is distinguished by the highest beauties of strong, concise, bold, and figurative expression.

Conciseness and strength, are two of its most remarkable characters. One might indeed at first imagine, that the practice of the Hebrew Poets, of always amplifying the same thought, by repetition or contrast, might tend to enfeeble their Style. But they conduct themselves so as not to produce this effect. Their sentences are always short. Few superfluous words are used. The same thought is never dwelt upon long. To their conciseness and sobriety of expression, their poetry is indebted for much of its sublimity ; and all Writers who attempt the sublime, might profit much, by imitating in this respect, the Style of the Old Testament. For, as I have formerly had occasion to shew, nothing is so great an enemy to the Sublime, as prolixity or diffuseness. The mind is never so much affected by any great idea that is presented to it, as when it is struck all at once ; by attempting to prolong the impression, we at the same time weaken it. Most of the ancient original Poets of all nations are simple and concise. The superfluities and excrescences of Style were the result of imitation in after-times; when Composition passed into inferior hands, and flowed from art and study, more than from native genius.

No Writings whatever abound so much with the most bold and animated figures, as the Sacred Books. It is proper to dwell a little upon this article; as, through our early familiarity with these books, a familiarity too often with the sound of the words, rather than with their sense and meaning, beauties of Style escape us in the Scripture, which, in any other book, would draw particular attention. Metaphors, Comparisons, Allegories, and Personifications, are there particularly frequent. In order to do justice to these, it is necessary that we transport ourselves as much as we can into the land of Judæa; and place before our eyes that scenery, and those objects with which the Hebrew Writers were conversant. Some attention of this kind is requisite, in order to relish the writings of any Poet of a foreign country, and a different age. For the imagery of every good Poet is copied from nature and real life; if it were not so, it could not be lively; and therefore, in order to enter into the propriety of his images, we must endeavour to place ourselves in his situation. Now we shall find, that the Metaphors and Comparisons of the Hebrew Poets present to us a very beautiful view of the natural objects of their own country, and of the arts and employments of their common life.

Natural objects are in some measure common to them with Poets of all ages and countries. Light and darkness, trees and flowers, the forest and the cultivated field, suggest to them many beautiful figures. But, in order to relish their figures of this kind, we must take notice, that several of them arise from the particular circumstances of the land of Judea. During the summer months, little or no rain falls throughout all that region. While the heats continued, the country was intolerably parched; want of water was a great distress; and a plentiful shower falling or a rivulet breaking forth, altered the whole face of nature, and introduced much higher ideas of refreshment and pleasure, than the like causes can suggest to us. Hence, to represent distress, such frequent allusions among them, “to a dry and thirsty land, where no water is;” and hence, to describe a change from distress to prosperity, their metaphors are founded on the falling of showers, and the bursting out of springs in the desert. Thus in Isaiah, “The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose. For in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert; and the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land, springs of water; in the habitation of dragons there shall be grass, with rushes and reeds.” Chap. xxxv. 1, 6, 7. Images of this nature are very familiar to Isaiah, and occur in many parts of his Book.

Again, as Judea was a hilly country, it was, during the rainy months, exposed to frequent inundations by the rushing of torrents, which came down suddenly from the mountains, and carried every thing before them; and Jordan, their only great river, annually overflowed its banks. Hence the frequent allusions to “the noise, and to the rushings of many waters;” and hence great calamities so often compared to the overflowing torrent, which, in such a country, must have been images particularly striking:

“ Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts; all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me.” Psalm xlii. 7.

The two most remarkable mountains of the country, were Lebanon and Carmel: the former noted for its height, and the woods of lofty cedars that covered it; the latter, for its beauty and fertility, the richness of its vines and olives. Hence, with the greatest propriety, Lebanon is employed as an image of whatever is great, strong, or magnificent: Carmel of what is smiling and beautiful. “ The glory of Lebanon,” says Isaiah, “ shall be given to it, and the excellency of Carmel.” (xxxv. 2.) Lebanon is often put metaphorically for the whole state or people of Israel, for the temple, for the king of Assyria; Carmel, for the blessings of peace and prosperity. “ His countenance is as Lebanon,” says Solomon, speaking of the dignity of man’s appearance; but when he describes female beauty, “ Thine head is like mount Carmel.” Song, v. 15. and vii. 5.

It is farther to be remarked under this head, that in the images of the awful and terrible kind, with which the Sacred Poets abound, they plainly draw their descriptions from that violence of the elements, and those concussions of nature, with which their climate rendered them acquainted. Earthquakes were not unfrequent; and the tempests of hail, thunder, and lightning, in Judæa and Arabia, accompanied with whirlwinds and darkness, far exceed any thing of that sort which happens in more temperate regions. Isaiah describes, with great majesty, the earth “ reeling to and fro like a drunkard, and removed like a cottage.” (xxiv. 20.) And in those circumstances of terror, with which an appearance of the Almighty is described in the 18th Psalm, when his "pavilion round about him was darkness; " when hailstones and coals of fire were his voice; " and when, at his rebuke, the channels of the " waters are said to be seen, and the foundations of " the hills discovered;" though there may be some reference, as Dr. Lowth thinks, to the history of God's descent upon Mount Sinai, yet it seems more probable, that the figures were taken directly from those commotions of nature with which the Author was acquainted, and which suggested stronger and nobler images than what now occur to us.

Besides the natural objects of their own country, we find the rites of their religion, and the arts and employments of their common life, frequently employed as grounds of imagery among the Hebrews. They were a people chiefly occupied with agriculture and pasturage. These were arts held in high honour among them; not disdained by their patriarchs, kings, and prophets. Little addicted to commerce, separated from the rest of the world by their laws and their religion; they were, during the better days of their state, strangers in a great measure to the refinements of luxury. Hence flowed, of course, the many allusions to pastoral life, to the "green " pastures and the still waters," and to the care and watchfulness of a shepherd over his flock, which carry to this day so much beauty and tenderness in them, in the 23d Psalm, and in many other passages of the Poetical Writings of Scripture. Hence, all the images founded upon rural employments, upon the wine-press, the threshing-floor, the stubble and the chaff. To disrelish all such images, is the effect of false delicacy. Homer is at least as frequent, and much more minute and particular in his similes, founded on what we now call low life; but, in his management of them, far inferior to the Sacred Writers, who generally mix with their comparisons of this kind somewhat of dignity and grandeur to ennoble them. What inexpressible grandeur does the following rural image in Isaiah, for instance, receive from the intervention of the Deity: “The nations shall rush like the rushings of many waters; but God shall rebuke them, and they shall fly far off: and they shall be chased as the chaff of the mountain before the wind, and like the down of the thistle before the whirlwind.”

Figurative allusions too, we frequently find, to the rites and ceremonies of their religion; to the legal distinctions of things clean and unclean; to the mode of their Temple Service; to the dress of their Priests, and to the most noted incidents recorded in their Sacred History; as to the destruction of Sodom, the descent of God upon Mount Sinai, and the miraculous passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea. The religion of the Hebrews included the whole of their laws, and civil constitution. It was full of splendid external rites, that occupied their senses; it was connected with every part of their national history and establishment; and hence, all ideas founded on religion, possessed in this nation a dignity and importance peculiar to themselves, and were uncommonly fitted to impress the imagination.

From all this it results, that the imagery of the Sacred Poets, is, in a high degree, expressive and natural; it is copied directly from real objects, that were before their eyes; it has this advantage, of being more complete within itself, more entirely founded on national ideas and manners, than that of most other Poets. In reading their works, we find ourselves continually in the land of Judæa. The palm-trees, and the cedars of Lebanon, are ever rising in our view. The face of their territory, the circumstances of their climate, the manners of the people, and the august ceremonies of their religion, constantly pass under different forms before us.

The comparisons employed by the Sacred Poets are generally short, touching on one point only of resemblance, rather than branching out into little Episodes. In this respect, they have perhaps an advantage over the Greek and Roman Authors; whose comparisons, by the length to which they are extended, sometimes interrupt the narration too much, and carry too visible marks of study and labour. Whereas, in the Hebrew Poets, they appear more like the glowings of a lively fancy, just glancing aside to some resembling object, and presently returning to its track. Such is the following fine comparison; introduced to describe the happy influence of good government upon a people, in what are called the last words of David, recorded in the 2d book of Samuel (xxiii. 3.): “ He that ruleth over “ men must be just, ruling in the fear of God; and “ he shall be as the light of the morning, when the “ sun riseth; even a morning without clouds; as “ the tender grass springing out of the earth, by “ clear shining after rain.” This is one of the most regular and formal comparisons in the Sacred Books.

Allegory, likewise, is a figure frequently found in them. When formerly treating of this figure, I gave for an instance of it, that remarkably fine and well-supported Allegory, which occurs in the 80th Psalm, wherein the People of Israel are compared to a vine. Of Parables, which form a species of Allegory, the Prophetical Writings are full: and if to us they sometimes appear obscure, we must remember, that in those early times, it was universally the mode throughout all the eastern nations, to convey sacred truths under mysterious figures and representations.

But the Poetical Figure, which beyond all others, elevates the style of Scripture, and gives it a peculiar boldness and sublimity, is Prosopœia or Personification. No personifications employed by any Poets, are so magnificent and striking as those of the Inspired Writers. On great occasions, they animate every part of nature; especially, when any appearance or operation of the Almighty is concerned. “Before “ him went the pestilence — the waters saw thee, O
“ God, and were afraid — the mountains saw thee,
“ and they trembled. — The overflowing of the water
“ passed by; — the deep uttered his voice, and lifted “ up his hands on high.” When inquiry is made about the place of wisdom, Job introduces the “ Deep, saying, it is not in me; and the sea saith,
“ it is not in me. Destruction and death say, we “ have heard the fame thereof with our ears.” That noted sublime passage in the Book of Isaiah, which describes the fall of the King of Assyria, is full of personified objects; the fir-trees and cedars of Lebanon breaking forth into exultation on the fall of the tyrant; Hell from beneath, stirring up all the dead to meet him at his coming; and the dead kings introduced as speaking, and joining in the triumph. In the same strain are these many lively and passionate apostrophes to cities and countries, to persons and things, with which the Prophetical Writings every where abound. "O thou sword of the Lord! how long will it be, ere thou be quiet? put thyself up into the scabbard, rest and be still. How can it be quiet," (as the reply is instantly made,) "seeing the Lord hath given it a charge against Askelon, and the sea-shore? there hath he appointed it." Jerem. xlvii. 6.

In general, for it would carry us too far to enlarge upon all the instances, the Style of the Poetical Books of the Old Testament is, beyond the Style of all other Poetical Works, fervid, bold, and animated. It is extremely different from that regular correct expression, to which our ears are accustomed in Modern Poetry. It is the burst of inspiration. The scenes are not coolly described, but represented as passing before our eyes. Every object, and every person, is addressed and spoken to, as if present; the transition is often abrupt; the connection often obscure; the persons are often changed; figures crowded and heaped upon one another. Bold sublimity, not correct elegance, is its character. We see the spirit of the Writer raised beyond himself, and labouring to find vent for ideas too mighty for his utterance.

After these remarks on the Poetry of the Scripture in general, I shall conclude this Dissertation, with a short account of the different kinds of Poetical Composition in the Sacred Books; and of the distinguishing characters of some of the chief Writers.

The several kinds of Poetical Composition which we find in Scripture, are chiefly the Didactic, Elegiac, Pastoral, and Lyric. Of the Didactic species of Poetry, the Book of Proverbs is the principal instance.

The nine first Chapters of that Book are highly poetical, adorned with many distinguished graces, and figures of expression. At the 10th Chapter, the Style is sensibly altered, and descends into a lower strain, which is continued to the end; retaining however that sententious, pointed manner, and that artful construction of period, which distinguish all the Hebrew Poetry. The Book of Ecclesiastes comes likewise under this head; and some of the Psalms, as the 119th in particular.

Of Elegiac Poetry, many very beautiful specimens occur in Scripture; such as the Lamentation of David over his friend Jonathan; several passages in the Prophetical Books; and several of David's Psalms, composed on occasions of distress and mourning. The 42d Psalm in particular, is, in the highest degree, tender and plaintive. But the most regular and perfect Elegiac Composition in the Scripture, perhaps in the whole world, is the Book, entitled the Lamentations of Jeremiah. As the Prophet mourns in that book over the destruction of the Temple, and the Holy City, and the overthrow of the whole State, he assembles all the affecting images which a subject so melancholy could suggest. The Composition is uncommonly artificial. By turns, the Prophet, and the city Jerusalem, are introduced, as pouring forth their sorrows; and in the end, a chorus of the people send up the most earnest and plaintive supplications to God. The lines of the original too, as may, in part, appear from our Translation, are longer than is usual in the other kinds of Hebrew Poetry; and the melody is rendered thereby more flowing, and better adapted to the querimonious strain of Elegy.

The Song of Solomon affords us a high exemplification of Pastoral Poetry. Considered with respect to its spiritual meaning, it is undoubtedly a mystical Allegory; in its form, it is a Dramatic Pastoral, or a perpetual Dialogue between personages in the character of Shepherds; and, suitably to that form, it is full of rural and pastoral images, from beginning to end.

Of Lyric Poetry, or that which is intended to be accompanied with Music, the Old Testament is full. Besides a great number of Hymns and Songs, which we find scattered in the Historical and Prophetical Books, such as the Song of Moses, the Song of Deborah, and many others of like nature, the whole Book of Psalms is to be considered as a collection of Sacred Odes. In these, we find the Ode exhibited in all the varieties of its form, and supported with the highest spirit of Lyric Poetry; sometimes sprightly, cheerful, and triumphant; sometimes solemn and magnificent; sometimes tender and soft. From these instances, it clearly appears, that there are contained in the Holy Scriptures, full exemplifications of several of the chief kinds of Poetical Writing.

Among the different Composers of the Sacred Books, there is an evident diversity of style and manner; and to trace their different characters in this view, will contribute not a little towards our reading their writings with greater advantage. The most eminent of the Sacred Poets are, the Author of the Book of Job, David, and Isaiah. As the Compositions of David are of the Lyric kind, there is a greater variety of style and manner in his works than in those of the other two. The manner in which, considered merely as a Poet, David chiefly excels, is the pleasing, the soft, and the tender. In his Psalms, there are many lofty and sublime passages; but in strength of description, he yields to Job; in sublimity, he yields to Isaiah. It is a sort of t mperate grandeur, for which David is chiefly distinguished; and to this he always soon returns, when, upon some occasions, he rises above it. The Psalms in which he touches us most, are those in which he describes the happiness of the righteous, or the goodness of God; expresses the tender breathing of a devout mind, or sends up moving and affectionate supplications to Heaven. Isaiah is, without exception, the most sublime of all Poets. This is abundantly visible in our translation; and, what is a material circumstance, none of the Books of Scripture appear to have been more happily translated than the Writings of this Prophet. Majesty is his reigning character; a majesty more commanding, and more uniformly supported, than is to be found among the rest of the Old Testament Poets. He possesses, indeed, a dignity and grandeur, both in his conceptions and expressions, which is altogether unparalleled, and peculiar to himself. There is more clearness and order too, and a more visible distribution of parts, in his Book, than in any other of the Prophetical Writings.

When we compare him with the rest of the Poetical Prophets, we immediately see, in Jeremiah, a very different genius. Isaiah employs himself generally on magnificent subjects. Jeremiah seldom discovers any disposition to be sublime, and inclines always to the tender and elegiac. Ezechiel, in poetical grace and elegance, is much inferior to them both: but he is distinguished by a character of uncommon force and ardour. To use the elegant expressions of Bishop Lowth, with regard to this Prophet: “ Est atrox; vehemens, tragicus; in sensibus, fervidus, acerbus; indignabundus; in imaginibus, fecundus, truculentus, et nonnunquam penè deformis; in dictione grandiloquus, gravis, austerus, et interdum incultus; frequens in repetitionibus, non decoris aut gratiæ causa, sed ex indignatione et violentia. Quicquid susceperit tractandum id sedulò persequitur; in eo unicè hæret defixus; a proposito raro deflectens. In cæteris, a plerisque vaticibus fortasse superatùs; sed in eo genere, ad quod videtur a natura unice comparatus, nimirum, vi, pondere, impetu, granditate, nemo unquam eum superavit.” The same learned Writer compares Isaiah to Homer, Jeremiah to Simonides, and Ezechiel to Æschylus. Most of the Book of Isaiah is strictly Poetical; of Jeremiah and Ezechiel, not above one half can be held to belong to Poetry. Among the Minor Prophets, Hosea, Joel, Micah, Habakkuk, and especially Nahum, are distinguished for poetical spirit. In the Prophecies of Daniel and Jonah, there is no Poetry.

It only now remains to speak of the Book of Job, with which I shall conclude. It is known to be extremely ancient; generally reputed the most ancient of all the Poetical Books; the Author uncertain. It is remarkable, that this Book has no connection with the affairs, or manners of the Jews, or Hebrews. The scene is laid in the land of Uz, or Idumea, which is a part of Arabia; and the Imagery employed is generally of a different kind from what I before showed to be peculiar to the Hebrew Poets. We meet with no allusions to the great events of Sacred History, to the religious rites of the Jews, to Lebanon or to Carmel, or any of the peculiarities of the climate of Judæa. We find few comparisons founded on rivers or torrents; these were not familiar objects in Arabia. But the longest comparison that occurs in the Book, is to an object frequent and well known in that region, a brook that fails in the season of heat, and disappoints the expectation of the traveller.

The Poetry, however, of the Book of Job is not only equal to that of any other of the Sacred Writings, but is superior to them all, except those of Isaiah alone. As Isaiah is the most sublime, David the most pleasing and tender, so Job is the most descriptive, of all the inspired Poets. A peculiar glow of fancy, and strength of description, characterise the Author. No Writer whatever abounds so much in Metaphors. He may be said not to describe but to render visible, whatever he treats of. A variety of instances might be given. Let us remark only those strong and lively colours, with which, in the following passages, taken from the 18th and 20th Chapters of his Book, he paints the condition of the wicked; observe how rapidly his figures rise before us; and what a deep impression, at the same time, they leave on the imagination. “ Knowest thou not “ this of old, since man was placed upon the earth, “ that the triumphing of the wicked is short, and “ the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment? Though “ his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his “ head reach the clouds, yet he shall perish for ever.
“ He shall fly away as a dream, and shall not be “ found; yea, he shall be chased away as a vision of “ the night. The eye also which saw him, shall see “ him no more; they which have seen him shall say,

“ where is he? He shall suck the poison of asps;
“ the viper’s tongue shall slay him. In the fulness “ of his sufficiency, he shall be in straits; every “ hand shall come upon him. He shall flee from “ the iron weapon, and the bow of steel shall strike “ him through. All darkness shall be hid in his “ secret places. A fire not blown shall consume “ him. The Heaven shall reveal his iniquity, and “ the earth shall rise up against him. The increase “ of his house shall depart. His goods shall flow “ away in the day of wrath. The light of the “ wicked shall be put out; the light shall be dark in “ his tabernacle. The steps of his strength shall “ be straitened, and his own counsel shall cast him “ down. For he is cast into a net by his own feet.
“ He walketh upon a snare. Terrors shall make him “ afraid on every side; and the robber shall prevail “ against him. Brimstone shall be scattered upon “ his habitation. His remembrance shall perish “ from the earth, and he shall have no name in “ the street. He shall be driven from light into “ darkness. They that come after him shall be asto“ nished at his day. He shall drink of the wrath of
“ the Almighty.”

LECTURE XLII.

EPIC POETRY.

It now remains to treat of the two highest kinds of Poetical Writing, the Epic and the Dramatic. I begin with the Epic. This Lecture shall be employed upon the general principles of that species of Composition: after which, I shall take a view of the character and genius of the most celebrated Epic Poets.

The Epic Poem is universally allowed to be, of all poetical works, the most dignified, and, at the same time, the most difficult in execution. To contrive a story which shall please and interest all Readers, by being at once entertaining, important, and instructive; to fill it with suitable incidents; to enliven it with a variety of characters, and of descriptions; and, throughout a long work, to maintain that propriety of sentiment, and that elevation of Style, which the Epic Character requires, is unquestionably the highest effort of Poetical Genius. Hence so very few have succeeded in the attempt, that strict Critics will hardly allow any other Poems to bear the name of Epic, except the Iliad and the Æneid.

There is no subject, it must be confessed, on which Critics have displayed more pedantry, than on this. By tedious Disquisitions, founded on a servile submission to authority, they have given such an air of mystery to a plain subject, as to render it difficult for an ordinary Reader to conceive what an Epic Poem is. By Bossu's definition, it is a Discourse invented by art, purely to form the manners of men, by means of instructions disguised under the allegory of some important action, which is related in Verse. This definition would suit several of Æsop's Fables, if they were somewhat extended, and put into Verse; and, accordingly, to illustrate his definition, the Critic draws a parallel, in form, between the construction of one of Æsop's Fables, and the plan of Homer's Iliad. The first thing, says he, which either a Writer of Fables, or of Heroic Poems, does, is to choose some maxim or point of morality; to inculcate which, is to be the design of his work. Next, he invents a general story, or a series of facts, without any names, such as he judges will be most proper for illustrating his intended moral. Lastly, he particularises his story; that is, if he be a Fabulist, he introduces his dog, his sheep, and his wolf; or if he be an Epic Poet, he looks out in Ancient History for some proper names of heroes to give to his actors; and then his plan is completed.

This is one of the most frigid and absurd ideas that ever entered into the mind of a Critic. Homer, he says, saw the Grecians divided into a great number of independent States; but very often obliged to unite into one body against their common enemies. The most useful instruction which he could give them in this situation, was, that a misunderstanding between princes is the ruin of the common cause. In order to enforce this instruction, he contrived, in his own mind, such a general story as this. Several princes join in a confederacy against their enemy. The prince, who was chosen as the leader of the rest, affronts one of the most valiant of the confederates, who thereupon withdraws himself, and refuses to take part in the common enterprise. Great misfortunes are the consequence of this division; till, at length, both parties having suffered by the quarrel, the offended prince forgets his displeasure, and is reconciled to the leader; and union being once restored, there ensues complete victory over their enemies. Upon this general plan of his Fable, adds Bossu, it was of no great consequence, whether, in filling it up, Homer had employed the names of beasts, like Æsop, or of men. He would have been equally instructive either way. But as he rather fancied to write of heroes, he pitched upon the wall of Troy for the scene of his Fable; he feigned such an action to happen there; he gave the name of Agamemnon to the common leader; that of Achilles, to the offended Prince; and so the Iliad arose.

He that can believe Homer to have proceeded in this manner, may believe any thing. One may pronounce, with great certainty, that an Author who should compose according to such a plan; who should arrange all the subject, in his own mind, with a view to the moral, before he had ever thought of the personages who were to be the Actors, might write, perhaps, useful Fables for children; but as to an Epic Poem, if he adventured to think of one, it would be such as would find few Readers. No person of any taste can entertain a doubt, that the first objects which strike an Epic Poet are, the Hero whom he is to celebrate, and the Action, or Story; which is to be the ground-work of his Poem. He does not sit down, like a Philosopher, to form the plan of a Treatise of Morality. His genius is fired by some great enterprise, which, to him, appears noble and interesting; and which, therefore, he pitches upon as worthy of being celebrated in the highest strain of Poetry. There is no subject of this kind, but will always afford some general moral instruction, arising from it naturally. The instruction which Bossu points out, is certainly suggested by the Iliad; and there is another which arises as naturally, and may just as well be assigned for the moral of that Poem; namely, that Providence avenges those who have suffered injustice; but that when they allow their resentment to carry them too far, it brings misfortunes on themselves. The subject of the Poem is the wrath of Achilles, caused by the injustice of Agamemnon. Jupiter avenges Achilles, by giving success to the Trojans against Agamemnon; but by continuing obstinate in his resentment, Achilles loses his beloved friend Patroclus.

The plain account of the nature of an Epic Poem is, the recital of some illustrious enterprise in a Poetical Form. This is as exact a definition as there is any occasion for on this subject. It comprehends several other Poems besides the Iliad of Homer, the Æneid of Virgil, and the Jerusalem of Tasso; which are, perhaps, the three most regular and complete Epic Works that ever were composed. But to exclude all Poems from the Epic Class, which are not formed exactly upon the same model as these, is the pedantry of Criticism. We can give exact definitions and descriptions of minerals, plants, and animals; and can arrange them with precision, under the different classes to which they belong, because Nature affords a visible unvarying standard, to which we refer them. But with regard to works of taste and imagination, where Nature has fixed no standard, but leaves scope for beauties of many different kinds, it is absurd to attempt defining, and limiting them, with the same precision. Criticism, when employed in such attempts, degenerates into trifling questions about words and names only. I therefore have no scruple to class such Poems, as Milton's Paradise Lost, Lucan's Pharsalia, Statius's Thebaid, Ossian's Fingal and Temora, Camoens' Lusiad, Voltaire's Henriade, Cambray's Telemachus, Glover's Leonidas, Wilkie's Epigoniad, under the same species of Composition with the Iliad and the Æneid; though some of them approach much nearer than others to the perfection of these celebrated Works. They are, undoubtedly, all Epic; that is, poetical recitals of great adventures; which is all that is meant by this denomination of Poetry.

Though I cannot, by any means, allow, that it is the essence of an Epic Poem to be wholly an Allegory, or a Fable contrived to illustrate some moral truth, yet it is certain that no Poetry is of a more moral nature than this. Its effect in promoting virtue, is not to be measured by any one maxim, or instruction, which results from the whole history, like the moral of one of Æsop's Fables. This is a poor and trivial view of the advantage to be derived from perusing a long Epic Work, that, at the end, we shall be able to gather from it some common-place morality. Its effect arises from the impression which the parts of the Poem separately, as well as the whole taken together, make upon the mind of the Reader: from the great examples which it sets before us, and the high sentiments with which it warms our hearts. The end which it proposes, is to extend our ideas of human perfection: or in other words to excite admiration. Now this can be accomplished only by proper representations of heroic deeds, and virtuous characters. For high virtue is the object, which all mankind are formed to admire; and, therefore, Epic Poems are, and must be, favourable to the cause of virtue. Valour, Truth, Justice, Fidelity, Friendship, Piety, Magnanimity, are the objects which, in the course of such Compositions, are presented to our minds, under the most splendid and honourable colours. In behalf of virtuous personages, our affections are engaged; in their designs, and their distresses, we are interested; the generous and public affections are awakened; the mind is purified from sensual and mean pursuits, and accustomed to take part in great, heroic enterprises. It is, indeed, no small testimony in honour of virtue, that several of the most refined and elegant entertainments of mankind, such as that species of Poetical Composition which we now consider, must be grounded on moral sentiments and impressions. This is a testimony of such weight, that, were it in the power of sceptical Philosophers, to weaken the force of those reasonings which establish the essential distinctions between Vice and Virtue, the writings of Epic Poets alone were sufficient to refute their false Philosophy; shewing by that appeal which they constantly make to the feelings of mankind in favour of virtue, that the foundations of it are laid deep and strong in human nature.

The general strain and spirit of Epic Composition, sufficiently mark its distinction from the other kinds of Poetry. In Pastoral Writing, the reigning idea is innocence and tranquillity. Compassion is the great object of Tragedy; Ridicule, the province of Comedy. The predominant character of the Epic is, admiration excited by heroic actions. It is sufficiently distinguished from History, both by its poetical form, and the liberty of fiction which it assumes. It is a more calm composition than Tragedy: It admits, nay requires, the pathetic and the violent, on particular occasions; but the pathetic is not expected to be its general character. It requires, more than any other species of Poetry, a grave, equal, and supported dignity. It takes in a greater compass of time and action, than Dramatic Writing admits; and thereby allows a more full display of characters. Dramatic Writings display characters chiefly by means of sentiments and passions; Epic Poetry, chiefly by means of actions. The emotions, therefore, which it raises, are not so violent, but they are more prolonged. These are the general characteristics of this species of Composition. But, in order to give a more particular and critical view of it, let us consider the Epic Poem under three heads; first, with respect to the Subject, or Action; secondly, with respect to the Actors, or Characters; and lastly, with respect to the Narration of the Poet.

The action, or subject of the Epic Poem, must have three properties; it must be one; it must be great; it must be interesting.

First, it must be one Action, or Enterprise, which the Poet chooses for his subject. I have frequently had occasion to remark the importance of unity, in many kinds of Composition, in order to make a full and strong impression upon the mind. With the highest reason, Aristotle insists upon this, as essential to Epic Poetry; and it is, indeed, the most material of all his rules respecting it. For it is certain, that, in the recital of heroic adventures, several scattered and independent facts can never affect a reader so deeply, nor engage his attention so strongly, as a tale that is one and connected, where the several incidents hang upon one another, and are all made to conspire for the accomplishment of one end. In a regular Epic, the more sensible this unity is rendered to the imagination, the better will be the effect; and for this reason, as Aristotle has observed, it is not sufficient for the Poet to confine himself to the Actions of one man, or to those which happened during a certain period of time; but the unity must lie in the subject itself, and arise from all the parts combining into one whole.

In all the great Epic Poems, unity of action is sufficiently apparent. Virgil, for instance, has chosen for his subject, the establishment of Æneas in Italy. From the beginning to the end of the Poem, this object is ever in our view, and links all the parts of it together with full connection. The unity of the Odyssey is of the same nature; the return and re-establishment of Ulysses in his own country. The subject of Tasso, is the recovery of Jerusalem from the Infidels; that of Milton, the expulsion of our first parents from Paradise; and both of them are unexceptionable in the unity of the Story. The professed subject of the Iliad, is the Anger of Achilles, with the consequences which it produced. The Greeks carry on many unsuccessful engagements against the Trojans, as long as they are deprived of the assistance of Achilles. Upon his being appeased and reconciled to Agamemnon, victory follows, and the Poem closes. It must be owned, however, that the Unity, or connecting principle, is not quite so sensible to the imagination here as in the Æneid. For, throughout many books of the Iliad, Achilles is out of sight; he is lost in inaction; and the fancy terminates on no other object, than the success of the two armies whom we see contending in war.

The unity of the Epic Action is not to be so strictly interpreted, as if it excluded all Episodes, or subordinate actions. It is necessary to observe here, that the term Episode is employed by Aristotle in a different sense from what we now give to it. It was a term originally applied to Dramatic Poetry, and thence transferred to Epic; and by Episodes, in an Epic Poem, it should seem that Aristotle understood the extension of the general Fable, or plan of the Poem, into all its circumstances. What his meaning was, is, indeed, not very clear; and this obscurity has occasioned much altercation among Critical Writers. Bossu, in particular, is so perplexed upon this subject, as to be almost unintelligible. But, dismissing so fruitless a controversy, what we now understand by Episodes, are certain actions, or incidents, introduced into the narration, connected with the principal action, yet not of such importance as to destroy, if they had been omitted, the main subject of the Poem. Of this nature are the interview of Hector with Andromache, in the Iliad; the story of Cacus, and that of Nisus and Euryalus, in the Æneid; the adventures of Tancred with Erminia and Clorinda, in the Jerusalem; and the prospect of his descendants exhibited to Adam, in the last books of Paradise Lost.

Such Episodes as these, are not only permitted to an Epic Poet; but, provided they be properly executed, are great ornaments to his work. The rules regarding them are the following:

First, They must be naturally introduced; they must have a sufficient connection with the subject of the Poem; they must seem inferior parts that belong to it; not mere appendages stuck to it. The Episode of Olinda and Sophronia, in the second book of Tasso's Jerusalem, is faulty, by transgressing this rule. It is too much detached from the rest of the work; and being introduced so near the opening of the Poem, misleads the Reader into an expectation, that it is to be of some future consequence; whereas it proves to be connected with nothing that follows. In proportion as any Episode is slightly related to the main subject, it should always be the shorter. The passion of Dido in the Æneid, and the snares of Armida in the Jerusalem, which are expanded so fully in these Poems, cannot with propriety be called Episodes. They are constituent parts of the work, and form a considerable share of the intrigue of the Poem.

In the next place, Episodes ought to present to us, objects of a different kind, from those which go before, and those which follow, in the course of the Poem. For it is principally for the sake of variety, that Episodes are introduced into an Epic Composition. In so long a work, they tend to diversify the subject, and to relieve the Reader, by shifting the scene. In the midst of combats, therefore, an Episode of the martial kind would be out of place; whereas, Hector's visit to Andromache in the Iliad, and Erminia's adventure with the Shepherd in the seventh book of the Jerusalem, afford us a well-judged and pleasing retreat from camps and battles.

Lastly, As an Episode is a professed embellishment, it ought to be particularly elegant and well-finished; and, accordingly, it is, for the most part, in pieces of this kind, that poets put forth their strength. The Episodes of Terebazus and Ariana, in Leonidas, and of the death of Hercules, in the Epigoniad, are the two greatest beauties in these Poems.

The unity of the Epic Action necessarily supposes, that the action be entire and complete; that is, as Aristotle well expresses it, that it have a beginning, a middle, and an end. Either by relating the whole, in his own person, or by introducing some of his Actors to relate what had passed before the opening of the Poem, the Author must always contrive to give us full information of every thing that belongs to his subject; he must not leave our curiosity, in any article, ungratified; he must bring us precisely to the accomplishment of his plan; and then conclude.

The second property of the Epic Action, is, that it be great; that it have sufficient splendour and importance, both to fix our attention, and to justify the magnificent apparatus which the Poet bestows upon it. This is so evidently requisite as not to require illustration; and indeed, hardly any who have attempted Epic Poetry, have failed in choosing some subject sufficiently important, either by the nature of the action, or by the fame of the personages concerned in it.

It contributes to the grandeur of the Epic Subject, that it be not of a modern date, nor fall within any period of history with which we are intimately acquainted. Both Lucan and Voltaire have, in the choice of their subjects, transgressed this rule, and they have, upon that account, succeeded worse. Antiquity is favourable to those high and august ideas which Epic Poetry is designed to raise. It tends to aggrandize, in our imagination, both persons and events; and what is still more material, it allows the Poet the liberty of adorning his subject by means of fiction. Whereas, as soon as he comes within the verge of real and authenticated history, this liberty is abridged. He must either confine himself wholly, as Lucan has done, to strict historical truth, at the expence of rendering his story jejune; or, if he goes beyond it, like Voltaire in his Henriade, this disadvantage follows, that, in well-known events, the true and the fictitious parts of the plan do not naturally mingle, and incorporate with each other. These observations cannot be applied to Dramatic Writing; where the personages are exhibited to us, not so much that we may admire, as that we may love or pity them. Such passions are much more consistent with the familiar historical knowledge of the persons who are to be the objects of them; and even require them to be displayed in the light, and with the failings of ordinary men. Modern, and well-known history, therefore, may furnish very proper materials for Tragedy. But for Epic Poetry, where heroism is the ground-work, and where the object in view is to excite admiration, ancient or traditionary history is assuredly the safest region. There, the author may lay hold on names, and characters, and events, not wholly unknown, on which to build his Story; while, at the same time, by reason of the distance of the period, or of the remoteness of the scene, sufficient licence is left him for fiction and invention.

The third property required in the Epic Poem, is, that it be interesting. It is not sufficient for this purpose that it be great. For deeds of mere valour, how heroic soever, may prove cold and tiresome. Much will depend on the happy choice of some subject, which shall, by its nature, interest the Public; as when the Poet selects for his Hero, one who is the founder, or the deliverer, or the favourite of his nation; or when he writes of achievements that have been highly celebrated, or have been connected with important consequences to any public cause. Most of the great Epic Poems are abundantly fortunate in this respect, and must have been very interesting to those ages and countries in which they were composed.

But the chief circumstance which renders an Epic Poem interesting, and which tends to interest, not one age or country alone, but all Readers, is the skilful conduct of the Author in the management of his subject. He must so contrive his plan, as that it shall comprehend many affecting incidents. He must not dazzle us perpetually with valiant achievements; for all Readers tire of constant fighting, and battles; but he must study to touch our hearts. He may sometimes be awful and august; he must often be tender and pathetic; he must give us gentle and pleasing scenes of love, friendship, and affection. The more an Epic Poem abounds with situations which awaken the feelings of humanity, the more interesting it is; and these form, always, the favourite passages of the work. I know no Epic Poets so happy in this respect as Virgil and Tasso.

Much, too, depends on the characters of the Heroes, for rendering the Poem interesting; that they be such as shall strongly attach the Readers, and make them take part in the dangers which the Heroes encounter. These dangers, or obstacles, form what is called the Nodus, or the Intrigue of the Epic Poem; in the judicious conduct of which consists much of the Poet's art. He must rouse our attention, by a prospect of the difficulties which seem to threaten disappointment to the enterprize of his favourite personages; he must make these difficulties grow and thicken upon us, by degrees; till, after having kept us, for some time, in a state of agitation and suspense, he paves the way, by a proper preparation of incidents, for the winding up of the plot in a natural and probable manner. It is plain, that every tale which is designed to engage attention, must be conducted on a plan of this sort.

A Question has been moved, whether the nature of the Epic Poem does not require that it should always end successfully? Most Critics are inclined to think, that a successful issue is the most proper; and they appear to have reason on their side. An unhappy conclusion depresses the mind, and is opposite to the elevating emotions which belong to this species of Poetry. Terror and compassion are the proper subjects of Tragedy; but as the Epic Poem is of larger compass and extent, it were too much, if, after the difficulties and troubles which commonly abound in the progress of the Poem, the Author should bring them all at last to an unfortunate issue. Accordingly, the general practice of Epic Poets is on the side of a prosperous conclusion ; not, however, without some exceptions. For two Authors of great name, Lucan and Milton, have held a contrary course ; the one concluding with the subversion of the Roman liberty ; the other, with the expulsion of man from Paradise.

With regard to the time or duration of the Epic Action, no precise boundaries can be ascertained. A considerable extent is always allowed to it, as it does not necessarily depend on those violent passions which can be supposed to have only a short continuance. The Iliad, which is formed upon the anger of Achilles, has, with propriety, the shortest duration of any of the great Epic Poems. According to Bossu, the action lasts no longer than forty-seven days. The action of the Odyssey, computed from the taking of Troy to the Peace of Ithaca, extends to eight years and a half ; and the action of the Æneid, computed in the same way, from the taking of Troy to the death of Turnus, includes about six years. But if we measure the period only of the Poet's own narration, or compute from the time in which the Hero makes his first appearance, till the conclusion, the duration of both these last Poems is brought within a much smaller compass. The Odyssey, beginning with Ulysses in the Island of Calypso, comprehends fifty-eight days only ; and the Æneid, beginning with the storm, which throws Æneas upon the coast of Africa, is reckoned to include, at the most, a year and some months.

Having thus treated of the Epic Action, or the Subject of the Poem, I proceed next to make some observations on the Actors or Personages.

As it is the business of an Epic Poet to copy after nature, and to form a probable interesting tale ; he must study to give all his personages proper and well-supported characters, such as display the features of human nature. This is what Aristotle calls, giving manners to the Poem. It is by no means necessary, that all his actors be morally good; imperfect, nay, vicious characters, may find a proper place; though the nature of Epic Poetry seems to require, that the principal figures exhibited should be such as tend to raise admiration and love, rather than hatred or contempt. But whatever the character be which a Poet gives to any of his actors, he must take care to preserve it uniform, and consistent with itself. Every thing which that person says, or does, must be suited to it, and must serve to distinguish him from any other.

Poetic characters may be divided into two kinds, general and particular. General characters are, such as wise, brave, virtuous, without any farther distinction. Particular characters express the species of bravery, of wisdom, of virtue, for which any one is eminent. They exhibit the peculiar features which distinguish one individual from another, which mark the difference of the same moral quality in different men, according as it is combined with other dispositions in their temper. In drawing such particular characters, genius is chiefly exerted. How far each of the three great Epic Poets have distinguished themselves in this part of Composition, I shall have occasion afterwards to shew, when I come to make remarks upon their works. It is sufficient now to mention, that it is in this part Homer has principally excelled; Tasso has come the nearest to Homer; and Virgil has been the most deficient.

It has been the practice of all Epic Poets, to select some one personage, whom they distinguish above all the rest, and make the hero of the tale. This is considered as essential to Epic Composition, and is attended with several advantages. It renders the unity of the subject more sensible, when there is one principal figure, to which, as to a centre, all the rest refer. It tends to interest us more in the enterprise which is carried on; and it gives the Poet an opportunity of exerting his talents for adorning and displaying one character, with peculiar splendour. It has been asked, who then is the hero of Paradise Lost? The Devil, it has been answered by some Critics; and, in consequence of this idea, much ridicule and censure has been thrown upon Milton. But they have mistaken that Author's intention, by proceeding upon a supposition, that, in the conclusion of the Poem, the hero must needs be triumphant. Whereas Milton followed a different plan, and has given a tragic conclusion to a Poem, otherwise Epic in its form. For Adam is undoubtedly his hero; that is, the capital and most interesting figure in his Poem.

Besides human actors, there are personages of another kind, that usually occupy no small place in Epic Poetry; I mean the gods, or supernatural beings. This brings us to the consideration of what is called the Machinery of the Epic Poem; the most nice and difficult part of the subject. Critics appear to me to have gone to extremes on both sides. Almost all the French Critics decide in favour of Machinery, as essential to the constitution of an Epic Poem. They quote that sentence of Petronius Arbiter, as if it were an oracle, "per ambages, Deorumque ministeria, precipitandus est liber spiritus," and hold, that though a Poem had every other requisite that could be demanded, yet it could not be ranked in the Epic class, unless the main action was carried on by the intervention of the gods. This decision seems to be founded on no principle or reason whatever, unless a superstitious reverence for the practice of Homer and Virgil. These poets very properly embellished their story by the traditional tales and popular legends of their own country; according to which, all the great transactions of the heroic times were intermixed with the fables of their deities. But does it thence follow, that in other countries, and other ages, where there is not the like advantage of current superstition, and popular credulity, Epic Poetry must be wholly confined to antiquated fictions, and fairy tales? Lucan has composed a very spirited Poem, certainly of the Epic kind, where neither gods nor supernatural beings are at all employed. The Author of Leonidas has made an attempt of the same kind, not without success; and beyond doubt, wherever a Poet gives us a regular heroic story, well connected in its parts, adorned with characters, and supported with proper dignity and elevation, though his agents be every one of them human, he has fulfilled the chief requisites of this sort of Composition, and has a just title to be classed with Epic Writers.

But though I cannot admit that Machinery is necessary or essential to the Epic plan, neither can I agree with some late Critics of considerable name, who are for excluding it totally, as inconsistent with that probability and impression of reality, which, they think, should reign in this kind of Writing.*

* See Elem. of Criticism; ch. 22.

Mankind do not consider Poetical Writings with so philosophical an eye. They seek entertainment from them; and for the bulk of Readers, indeed for almost all men, the marvellous has a great charm. It gratifies and fills the imagination; and gives room for many a striking and sublime description. In Epic Poetry, in particular, where admiration and lofty ideas are supposed to reign, the marvellous and supernatural find, if any where, their proper place. They both enable the Poet to aggrandize his subject, by means of those august and solemn objects which religion introduces into it; and they allow him to enlarge and diversify his plan, by comprehending within it heaven, and earth, and hell, men and invisible beings, and the whole circle of the Universe.

At the same time, in the use of this supernatural Machinery, it becomes a Poet to be temperate and prudent. He is not at liberty to invent what system of the marvellous he pleases. It must always have some foundation in popular belief. He must avail himself in a decent manner, either of the religious faith, or the superstitious credulity of the country wherein he lives, or of which he writes, so as to give an air of probability to events which are most contrary to the common course of Nature. Whatever Machinery he employs, he must take care not to overload us with it; not to withdraw human actions and manners too much from view, nor to obscure them under a cloud of incredible fictions. He must always remember that his chief business is to relate to men, the actions and the exploits of men; that it is by these principally he is to interest us, and to touch our hearts; and that if probability be altogether banished from his work, it can never make a deep or a lasting impression. Indeed, I know nothing more difficult in Epic Poetry, than to adjust properly the mixture of the marvellous with the probable; so as to gratify and amuse us with the one, without sacrificing the other. I need hardly observe, that these observations affect not the conduct of Milton's work; whose plan being altogether theological, his supernatural beings form not the machinery, but are the principal actors in the Poem.

With regard to Allegorical Personages, Fame, Discord, Love, and the like, it may be safely pronounced, that they form the worst machinery of any. In description they are sometimes allowable, and may serve for embellishment; but they should never be permitted to bear any share in the action of the Poem. For being plain and declared fictions, mere names of general ideas, to which even fancy cannot attribute any existence as persons, if they are introduced as mingling with human actors, an intolerable confusion of shadows and realities arise, and all consistency of action is utterly destroyed.

In the narration of the Poet, which is the last head that remains to be considered, it is not material, whether he relate the whole story in his own character, or introduce some of his personages to relate any part of the action that had passed before the Poem opens. Homer follows the one method in his Iliad, and the other in his Odyssey. Virgil has, in this respect, imitated the conduct of the Odyssey; Tasso that of the Iliad. The chief advantage which arises from any of the actors being employed to relate part of the story is, that it allows the Poet, if he chuses it, to open with some interesting situation of affairs, informing us afterwards of what had passed before that period; and gives him the greater liberty of spreading out such parts of the subject as he is inclined to dwell upon in person, and of comprehending the rest within a short recital. Where the subject is of great extent, and comprehends the transactions of several years, as in the Odyssey and the Æneid, this method therefore seems preferable. When the subject is of smaller compass, and shorter duration, as in the Iliad and the Jerusalem, the Poet may, without disadvantage, relate the whole in his own person.

In the proposition of the subject, the invocation of the Muse, and other ceremonies of the Introduction, Poets may vary at their pleasure. It is perfectly trifling to make these little formalities the object of precise rule, any farther, than that the subject of the work should always be clearly proposed, and without affected or unsuitable pomp. For, according to Horace's noted rule, no Introduction should ever set out too high, or promise too much, lest the Author should not fulfil the expectations he has raised.

What is of most importance in the tenor of the narration is, that it be perspicuous, animated, and enriched with all the beauties of Poetry. No sort of Composition requires more strength, dignity, and fire, than the Epic Poem. It is the region within which we look for every thing that is sublime in description, tender in sentiment, and bold and lively in expression; and, therefore, though an Author's plan should be faultless, and his story ever so well conducted, yet if he be feeble, or flat in Style, destitute of affecting scenes, and deficient in poetical colouring, he can have no success. The ornaments which Epic Poetry admits, must all be of the grave and chaste kind. Nothing that is loose, ludicrous, or affected, finds any place there. All the objects which it presents ought to be either great, or tender, or pleasing. Descriptions of disgusting or shocking objects should as much as possible be avoided; and therefore the fable of the Harpies, in the third book of the Æneid, and the allegory of Sin and Death, in the second book of Paradise Lost, had been better omitted in these celebrated Poems.

LECTURE XLIII.

HOMER'S ILIAD AND ODYSSEY.—VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

As the Epic Poem is universally allowed to possess the highest rank among Poetical Works, it merits a particular discussion. Having treated of the nature of this Composition, and the principal rules relating to it, I proceed to make some observations on the most distinguished Epic Poems, Ancient and Modern.

Homer claims, on every account, our first attention, as the Father not only of Epic Poetry, but, in some measure, of Poetry in general. Whoever sits down to read Homer, must consider that he is going to read the most ancient book in the world, next to the Bible. Without making this reflection, he cannot enter into the spirit, nor relish the Composition of the author. He is not to look for the correctness, and elegance, of the Augustan Age. He must divest himself of our modern ideas of dignity and refinement, and transport his imagination almost three thousand years back in the history of mankind. What he is to expect is a picture of the ancient world. He must reckon upon finding characters and manners that retain a considerable tincture of the savage state; moral ideas, as yet imperfectly formed; and the appetites and passions of men brought under none of those restraints, to which in a more advanced state of Society, they are accustomed; but bodily strength, prized as one of the chief heroic endowments; the preparing of a meal, and the appeasing of hunger, described as very interesting objects; and the heroes boasting of themselves openly, scolding one another outrageously, and glorying, as we should now think very indecently, over their fallen enemies.

The opening of the Iliad possesses none of that sort of dignity, which a modern looks for in a great Epic Poem. It turns on no higher subject, than the quarrel of two Chieftains about a female slave. The Priest of Apollo beseeches Agamemnon to restore his daughter, who, in the plunder of a city, had fallen to Agamemnon's share of booty. He refuses. Apollo, at the prayer of his Priest, sends a plague into the Grecian camp. The Augur, when consulted, declares, that there is no way of appeasing Apollo, but by restoring the daughter of his Priest. Agamemnon is enraged at the Augur; professes that he likes this slave better than his wife Clytemnestra; but since he must restore her, in order to save the army, insists to have another in her place; and pitches upon Briseis, the slave of Achilles. Achilles, as was to be expected, kindles into rage at this demand; re-proaches him for his rapacity and insolence, and, after giving him many hard names, solemnly swears, that, if he is to be thus treated by the General, he will withdraw his troops, and assist the Grecians no more against the Trojans. He withdraws accordingly. His mother, the Goddess Thetis, interests Jupiter in his cause; who, to revenge the wrong which Achilles had suffered, takes part against the Greeks, and suffers them to fall into great and long distress; until Achilles is pacified, and reconciliation brought about between him and Agamemnon.

Such is the basis of the whole action of the Iliad. Hence rise all those "speciosa miracula," as Horace terms them, which fill that extraordinary Poem; and which have had the power of interesting almost all the nations of Europe during every age, since the days of Homer. The general admiration commanded by a poetical plan, so very different from what any one would have formed in our times, ought not, upon reflection, to be matter of surprise. For, besides that a fertile genius can enrich and beautify any subject on which it is employed, it is to be observed, that ancient manners, how much soever they contradict our present notions of dignity and refinement, afford, nevertheless, materials for Poetry, superior, in some respects, to those which are furnished by a more polished state of Society. They discover human nature more open and undisguised, without any of those studied forms of behaviour which now conceal men from one another. They give free scope to the strongest and most impetuous emotions of the mind; which make a better figure in description, than calm and temperate feelings. They shew us our native prejudices, appetites, and desires, exerting themselves without controul. From this state of manners, joined with the advantage of that strong and expressive Style, which, as I formerly observed, commonly distinguishes the Compositions of early ages, we have ground to look for more of the boldness, ease, and freedom of native genius, in Compositions of such a period, than in those of more civilised times. And, accordingly, the two great characters of the Homeric Poetry are, Fire and Simplicity. Let us now proceed to make some more particular observations on the Iliad, under the three heads of the Subject and Action, the Characters, and Narration of the Poet.

The Subject of the Iliad must unquestionably be admitted to be, in the main, happily chosen. In the days of Homer, no object could be more splendid and dignified than the Trojan war. So great a confederacy of the Grecian States, under one leader; and the ten years siege which they carried on against Troy, must have spread far abroad the renown of many military exploits, and interested all Greece in the traditions concerning the Heroes who had most eminently signalized themselves. Upon these traditions, Homer grounded his Poem; and though he lived, as is generally believed, only two or three centuries after the Trojan war, yet, through the want of written records, tradition must, by his time, have fallen into the degree of obscurity most proper for Poetry; and have left him at full liberty to mix as much fable as he pleased with the remains of true history. He has not chosen, for his subject, the whole Trojan war; but, with great judgment, he has selected one part of it, the quarrel betwixt Achilles and Agamemnon, and the events to which that quarrel gave rise; which, though they take up forty-seven days only, yet include the most interesting and most critical period of the war. By this management, he has given greater unity to what would have otherwise been an unconnected history of battles. He has gained one Hero, or principal character, Achilles, who reigns throughout the work; and he has shewn the pernicious effect of discord among confederated princes. At the same time, I admit that Homer is less fortunate in his subject than Virgil. The plan of the Æneid includes a greater compass, and a more agreeable diversity of events; whereas the Iliad is almost entirely filled with battles.

The praise of high invention has in every age been given to Homer, with the greatest reason. The prodigious number of incidents, of speeches, of characters divine and human, with which he abounds; the surprising variety with which he has diversified his battles, in the wounds and deaths, and little history-pieces of almost all the persons slain, discover an invention next to boundless. But the praise of judgment is, in my opinion, no less due to Homer, than that of invention. His story is all along conducted with great art. He rises upon us gradually; his Heroes are brought out, one after another, to be objects of our attention. The distress thickens, as the Poem advances; and every thing is so contrived as to aggrandize Achilles, and to render him, as the Poet intended he should be, the capital figure.

But that wherein Homer excels all Writers is the characteristical part. Here, he is without a rival. His lively and spirited exhibition of characters is, in a great measure, owing to his being so dramatic a Writer, abounding every where with dialogue and conversation. There is much more dialogue in

Homer than in Virgil; or, indeed, than in any other Poet. What Virgil informs us of by two words of Narration, Homer brings about by a Speech. We may observe here, that this method of writing is more ancient than the narrative manner. Of this we have a clear proof in the books of the Old Testament, which, instead of Narration, abound with Speeches, with answers and replies, upon the most familiar subjects. Thus, in the Book of Genesis:

“ Joseph said unto his brethren, whence come ye?
 “ and they answered, From the land of Canaan we “ come to buy food. And Joseph said, Ye are spies;
 “ to see the nakedness of the land are ye come.
 “ And they said unto him, Nay, my Lord, but to “ buy food are thy servants come; we are all one “ man’s sons, we are true men, thy servants are no “ spies. And he said unto them, Nay, but to see “ the nakedness of the land ye are come. And “ they said, Thy servants are twelve brethren, the “ sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and “ behold the youngest is this day with our father; and “ one is not. And Joseph said unto them, This it is “ that I spake unto you, saying ye are spies. Hereby “ ye shall be proved; by the life of Pharaoh, ye “ shall not go forth, except your youngest brother “ come hither,” &c. Genesis, xlii. 7—15. Such a Style as this, is the most simple and artless form of Writing, and must therefore, undoubtedly, have been the most ancient. It is copying directly from nature; giving a plain rehearsal of what passed, or was supposed to pass, in conversation between the persons of whom the Author treats. In progress of time, when the Art of Writing was more studied, it was thought more elegant to compress the substance of conversation into short distinct narrative, made by the Poet or Historian in his own person; and to reserve direct speeches for solemn occasions only.

The Ancient Dramatic method which Homer practised has some advantages, balanced with some defects. It renders Composition more natural and animated, and more expressive of manners and characters; but withal less grave and majestic, and sometimes tiresome. Homer, it must be admitted, has carried his propensity to the making of Speeches too far; and if he be tedious any where, it is in these; some of them trifling, and some of them plainly unseasonable. Together with the Greek vivacity, he leaves upon our minds some impression of the Greek loquacity also. His Speeches, however, are upon the whole characteristic and lively; and to them we owe, in a great measure, that admirable display which he has given of human nature. Every one who reads him, becomes familiarly and intimately acquainted with his Heroes. We seem to have lived among them, and to have conversed with them. Not only has he pursued the single virtue of courage, through all its different forms and features, in his different warriors; but some more delicate characters, into which courage either enters not at all, or but for an inconsiderable part, he has drawn with singular art.

How finely, for instance, has he painted the character of Helen, so as, notwithstanding her frailty and her crimes, to prevent her from being an odious object! The admiration with which the old generals behold her, in the Third Book; when she is coming towards them, presents her to us with much dignity. Her veiling herself, and shedding tears, her confusion in the presence of Priam, her grief and self-accusations at the sight of Menelaus, her upbraiding Paris for his cowardice, and, at the same time, her returning fondness for him, exhibit the most striking features of that mixed female character, which we partly condemn, and partly pity. Homer never introduces her, without making her say something to move our compassion; while, at the same time, he takes care to contrast her character with that of a virtuous matron, in the chaste and tender Andromache.

Paris himself, the author of all the mischief, is characterised with the utmost propriety. He is, as we should expect him, a mixture of gallantry and effeminacy. He retreats from Menelaus, on his first appearance; but, immediately afterwards, enters into single combat with him. He is a great master of civility, remarkably courteous in his speeches; and receives all the reproofs of his brother Hector with modesty and deference. He is described as a person of elegance and taste. He was the Architect of his own Palace. He is, in the Sixth Book, found by Hector, burnishing and dressing up his armour; and issues forth to battle with a peculiar gaiety and ostentation of appearance, which is illustrated by one of the finest comparisons in all the Iliad, that of the horse prancing to the river.

Homer has been blamed for making his hero Achilles of too brutal and unamiable a character. But I am inclined to think, that injustice is commonly done to Achilles, upon the credit of two lines of Horace, who has certainly over-loaded his character:

Impiger, iracundus, inexorabilis, acer,
 Jura negat sibi nata; nihil non arogat armis.

Achilles is passionate, indeed, to a great degree; but he is far from being a contemner of laws and justice. In the contest with Agamemnon, though he carries it on with too much heat, yet he has reason on his side. He was notoriously wronged; but he submits; and resigns Briseis peaceably, when the heralds come to demand her; only, he will fight no longer under the command of a leader who had affronted him. Besides his wonderful bravery and contempt of death, he has several other qualities of a Hero. He is open and sincere. He loves his subjects, and respects the Gods. He is distinguished by strong friendships and attachments; he is thorough, high-spirited, gallant, and honourable; and allowing for a degree of ferocity which belonged to the times, and enters into the characters of most of Homer's Heroes, he is, upon the whole, abundantly fitted to raise high admiration, though not pure esteem.

Under the head of Characters, Homer's Gods, or his Machinery, according to the critical term, come under consideration. The Gods make a great figure in the Iliad; much greater indeed than they do in the Æneid, or in any other Epic Poem; and hence Homer has become the standard of Poetic Theology. Concerning Machinery in general, I delivered my sentiments in the former Lecture. Concerning Homer's Machinery, in particular, we must observe, that it was not his own invention. Like every other good Poet, he unquestionably followed the traditions of his country. The age of the Trojan war approached to the age of the Gods, and Demi-gods in Greece. Several of the Heroes concerned in that war were reputed to be the children of these Gods. Of course, the traditionary tales relating to them, and to the exploits of that age, were blended with the Fables of the Deities. These popular legends, Homer very properly adopted; though it is perfectly absurd to infer from this, that therefore Poets arising in succeeding ages, and writing on quite different subjects, are obliged to follow the same system of Machinery.

In the hands of Homer, it produces, on the whole, a noble effect; it is always gay and amusing; often, lofty and magnificent. It introduces into his Poem a great number of personages, almost as much distinguished by characters as his human actors. It diversifies his battles greatly by the intervention of the Gods; and by frequently shifting the scene from earth to heaven, it gives an agreeable relief to the mind, in the midst of so much blood and slaughter. Homer's Gods, it must be confessed, though they be always lively and animated figures, yet sometimes want dignity. The conjugal contentions between Juno and Jupiter, with which he entertains us, and the indecent squabbles he describes among the inferior Deities, according as they take different sides with the contending parties, would be very improper models for any modern Poet to imitate. In apology for Homer, however, it must be remembered, that according to the Fables of those days, the Gods are but one remove above the condition of men. They have all the human passions. They drink and feast, and are vulnerable like men; they have children and kinsmen, in the opposite armies; and except that they are immortal, that they have houses on the top of Olympus, and winged chariots, in which they are often flying down to earth, and then re-ascending, in order to feast on nectar and ambrosia; they are in truth no higher beings than the human Heroes, and therefore very fit to take part in their contentions. At the same time, though Homer so frequently degrades his divinities, yet he knows how to make them appear, in some conjunctures, with the most awful majesty. Jupiter, the Father of Gods and Men, is, for the most part, introduced with great dignity; and several of the most sublime conceptions in the Iliad are founded on the appearances of Neptune, Minerva, and Apollo, on great occasions.

With regard to Homer's Style and manner of Writing, it is easy, natural, and in the highest degree animated. It will be admired by such only as relish ancient simplicity, and can make allowance for certain negligences and repetitions, which greater refinement in the Art of Writing has taught succeeding, though far inferior, Poets to avoid. For Homer is the most simple in his Style of all the great Poets, and resembles most the Style of the poetical parts of the Old Testament. They can have no conception of his manner, who are acquainted with him in Mr. Pope's Translation only. An excellent poetical performance that Translation is, and faithful in the main to the Original. In some places, it may be thought to have even improved Homer. It has certainly softened some of his rudenesses, and added delicacy and grace to some of his sentiments. But withal, it is no other than Homer modernised. In the midst of the elegance and luxuriancy of Mr. Pope's language, we lose sight of the old Bard's simplicity. I know indeed no Author, to whom it is more difficult to do justice in a Translation, than Homer. As the plainness of his diction, were it literally rendered, would often appear flat in any modern language; so, in the midst of that plainness, and not a little heightened by it, there are every where breaking forth upon us flashes of native fire, of sublimity and beauty, which hardly any language, except his own, could preserve. His Versification has been universally acknowledged to be uncommonly melodious, and to carry, beyond that of any Poet, a resemblance in the sound to the sense and meaning.

In Narration, Homer is, at all times, remarkably concise, which renders him lively and agreeable; though in his speeches, as I have before admitted, sometimes tedious. He is every where descriptive; and descriptive by means of those well-chosen particulars, which form the excellency of description. Virgil gives us the nod of Jupiter with great magnificence:

Annuit; et totum nutu tremefecit Olympum.

But Homer, in describing the same thing, gives us the sable eye-brows of Jupiter bent, and his ambrosial curls shaken, at the moment when he gives the nod; and thereby renders the figure more natural and lively. Whenever he seeks to draw our attention to some interesting object, he particularises it so happily, as to paint it in a manner to our sight. The shot of Pindarus' arrow, which broke the truce between the two armies, as related in the Fourth Book, may be given for an instance; and above all, the admirable interview of Hector with Andromache, in the Sixth Book; where all the circumstances of conjugal and parental tenderness, the child affrighted with the view of his Father's Helmet and Crest, and clinging to the nurse; Hector putting off his Helmet, taking the child into his arms, and offering up a prayer for him to the Gods; Andromache receiving back the child with a smile of pleasure, and, at the same instant, bursting into tears, δακρυοεν γελασσα, as it is finely expressed in the original, form the most natural and affecting picture that can possibly be imagined.

In the description of Battles, Homer particularly excels. He works up the hurry, the terror, and confusion of them in so masterly a manner, as to place the Reader in the very midst of the engagement. It is here, that the fire of his genius is most highly displayed; insomuch, that Virgil's Battles, and indeed those of most other Poets, are cold and inanimated in comparison of Homer's.

With regard to Similies, no Poet abounds so much with them. Several of them are beyond doubt extremely beautiful: such as those of the fires in the Trojan camp compared to the Moon and Stars by night; Paris going forth to Battle, to the war-horse prancing to the river; and Euphorbus slain, to the flowering shrub cut down by a sudden blast: all which are among the finest poetical passages that are any where to be found. I am not, however, of opinion that Homer's Comparisons, taken in general, are his greatest beauties. They come too thick upon us; and often interrupt the train of his narration or description. The resemblance on which they are founded, is sometimes not clear; and the objects whence they are taken, are too uniform. His Lions,

Bulls, Eagles, and herds of Sheep, recur too frequently; and the allusions in some of his Similies, even after the allowances that are to be made for ancient manners, must be admitted to be debasing.*

My observations, hitherto, have been made upon the Iliad only. It is necessary to take some notice of the Odyssey also. Longinus's criticism upon it is not without foundation, that Homer may in this Poem be compared to the setting sun, whose grandeur still remains without the heat of his meridian beams. It wants the vigour and sublimity of the Iliad; yet, at the same time, possesses so many

* The severest critic upon Homer in modern times, M. la Motte, admits all that his admirers urge for the superiority of his genius and talents as a Poet: "C'étoit un génie naturellement Poétique, ami des Fables & des merveilleux, et porté en général à l'imitation, soit des objets de la nature, soit des sentimens et des actions des hommes. Il avoit l'esprit vaste et fécond: plus élevé que délicat, plus naturel qu'ingénieux, et plus amoureux de l'abondance que du choix. — Il a saisi, par une supériorité de gout, les premières idées de l'éloquence dans toutes les genres; il a parlé la langage des toutes les passions; et il a du moins ouvert aux écrivains qui doivent le suivre une infinité de routes, qu'il ne restoit plus qu'à applanir. Il y a apparence que en quelques temps qu'Homère eût veçu, il eût été, du moins, le plus grand Poète de son país: et a ne le prendre que dans ce sens, on peut dire, qu'il est le maître de ceux mêmes qui l'ont surpasse." — Discours sur Homère. Oeuvres de la Motte, Tome 2de. After these high praises of the Author, he indeed endeavours to bring the merit of the Iliad very low. But his principal objections turn on the debasing ideas which are there given of the Gods, the gross characters and manners of the Heroes, and the imperfect morality of the sentiments; which, as Voltaire observes, is like accusing a painter for having drawn his figures in the dress of the times. Homer painted his Gods, such as popular tradition then represented them; and described such characters and sentiments, as he found among those with whom he lived.

beauties, as to be justly entitled to high praise. It is a very amusing Poem, and has much greater variety than the Iliad; it contains many interesting stories, and beautiful descriptions. We see every where the same descriptive and dramatic genius, and the same fertility of invention that appears in the other work. It descends indeed from the dignity of Gods, and Heroes, and warlike achievements; but in recompence, we have more pleasing pictures of ancient manners. Instead of that ferocity which reigns in the Iliad, the Odyssey presents us with the most amiable images of hospitality and humanity; entertains us with many a wonderful adventure, and many a landscape of nature; and instructs us by a constant vein of morality and virtue, which runs through the Poem.

At the same time, there are some defects which must be acknowledged in the Odyssey. Many scenes in it fall below the majesty which we naturally expect in an Epic Poem. The last Twelve Books, after Ulysses is landed in Ithaca, are, in several parts, tedious and languid; and though the discovery, which Ulysses makes of himself to his Nurse Euryclea, and his interview with Penelope before she knows him, in the Nineteenth Book, are tender and affecting, yet the Poet does not seem happy in the great anagnorisis, or the discovery of Ulysses to Penelope. She is too cautious and distrustful, and we are disappointed of the surprise of joy, which we expected on that high occasion.

After having said so much of the Father of Epic Poetry, it is now time to proceed to Virgil, who has a character clearly marked, and quite distinct from that of Homer. As the distinguishing excellencies of the Iliad are, Simplicity and Fire; those of the Æneid are, Elegance and Tenderness. Virgil is, beyond doubt, less animated and less sublime than Homer; but to counterbalance this, he has fewer negligences, greater variety, and supports more of a correct and regular dignity throughout his work.

When we begin to read the Iliad, we find ourselves in the region of the most remote, and even unrefined antiquity. When we open the Æneid, we discover all the correctness, and the improvements, of the Augustan age. We meet with no contentions of heroes about a female slave; no violent scolding, nor abusive language, but the Poem opens with the utmost magnificence; with Juno, forming designs for preventing Æneas's establishment in Italy, and Æneas himself presented to us with all his fleet in the middle of a storm, which is described in the highest style of Poetry.

The subject of the Æneid is extremely happy; still more so, in my opinion, than either of Homer's Poems. As nothing could be more noble, nor carry more of Epic dignity, so nothing could be more flattering and interesting to the Roman people, than Virgil's deriving the origin of their state from so famous a hero as Æneas. The object was splendid in itself; it gave the Poet a theme, taken from the ancient traditional history of his own country; it allowed him to connect his subject with Homer's stories, and to adopt all his mythology; it afforded him the opportunity of frequently glancing at all the future great exploits of the Romans, and of describing Italy, and the very territory of Rome, in its ancient and fabulous state. The establishment of Æneas constantly traversed by Juno, leads to a great diversity of events, of voyages, and wars; and furnishes a proper intermixture of the incidents of peace with martial exploits. Upon the whole, I believe, there is no where to be found so complete a model of an Epic Fable, or Story, as Virgil's Æneid. I see no foundation for the opinion, entertained by some Critics, that the Æneid is to be considered as an Allegorical Poem, which carries a constant reference to the character and reign of Augustus Cæsar; or, that Virgil's main design in composing the Æneid, was to reconcile the Romans to the government of that Prince, who is supposed to be shadowed out under the character of Æneas. Virgil, indeed, like the other Poets of that age, takes every opportunity which his subject affords him, of paying court to Augustus.* But, to imagine that he carried a political plan in his view, through the whole Poem, appears to me no more than a fanciful refinement. He had sufficient motives, as a Poet, to determine him to the choice of his subject, from its being, in itself, both great and pleasing; from its being suited to his genius, and its being attended with the peculiar advantages, which I mentioned above, for the full display of poetical talents.

Unity of action is perfectly preserved; as, from beginning to end, one main object is always kept in view, the settlement of Æneas in Italy, by the order of the Gods. As the story comprehends the transactions of several years, part of the transactions are very properly thrown into a recital made by the Hero. The Episodes are linked with sufficient connection to the main subject; and the Nodus, or

* As particularly in that noted passage of the 6th book, l. 791.
Hic vir, hic est, tibi quem promitti sæpius audis, &c.

Intrigue of the Poem, is, according to the plan of ancient machinery, happily formed. The wrath of Juno, who opposes herself to the Trojan settlement in Italy, gives rise to all the difficulties which obstruct Æneas's undertaking, and connects the human with the celestial operations, throughout the whole work. Hence arise the tempest which throws Æneas upon the shore of Africa; the passion of Dido, who endeavours to detain him at Carthage; and the efforts of Turnus, who opposes him in war. Till, at last, upon a composition made with Jupiter, that the Trojan name shall be for ever sunk in the Latin, Juno foregoes her resentment, and the Hero becomes victorious.

In these main points, Virgil has conducted his work with great propriety, and shewn his art and judgment. But the admiration due to so eminent a Poet, must not prevent us from remarking some other particulars in which he has failed. First, there are scarce any characters marked in the Æneid. In this respect it is insipid, when compared to the Iliad, which is full of characters and life. Achates, and Cloanthus, and Gyas, and the rest of the Trojan heroes who accompanied Æneas into Italy, are so many undistinguished figures, who are in no way made known to us, either by any sentiments which they utter, or any memorable exploits which they perform. Even Æneas himself is not a very interesting Hero. He is described, indeed, as pious and brave; but his character is not marked with any of those strokes that touch the heart; it is a sort of cold and tame character; and, throughout his behaviour to Dido, in the fourth book, especially in the speech which he makes after she suspected his intention of leaving her, there appears a certain hardness, and want of relenting, which is far from rendering him amiable.* Dido's own character is by much the best supported, in the whole Æneid. The warmth of her passions, the keenness of her indignation and resentment, and the violence of her whole character, exhibit a figure greatly more animated than any other which Virgil has drawn.

Besides this defect of character in the Æneid, the distribution and management of the subject are, in some respects, exceptionable. The Æneid, it is true, must be considered with the indulgence due to a work not thoroughly completed. The six last books are said not to have received the finishing hand of the Author; and for this reason, he ordered, by his will, the Æneid to be committed to the flames. But though this may account for incorrectness of execution, it does not apologize for a falling off in the subject, which seems to take place in the latter part of the work. The wars with the Latins are inferior, in point of dignity, to the more interesting objects which had before been presented to us, in the destruction of Troy, the intrigue with Dido, and the descent into Hell. And in those Italian wars, there is, perhaps, a more material fault still, in the conduct of the story. The Reader, as Voltaire has observed, is tempted to take part with Turnus against Æneas. Turnus, a brave young prince, in love with Lavinia, his near relation, is destined for her by general consent, and highly favoured by her mother.

* Num fletu ingenuit nostro? Num lumina flexit?

Num lachrymas victus dedit? Aut miseratus amantem est?

Æn. iv. 368.

Lavinia herself discovers no reluctance to the match: when there arrives a stranger, a fugitive from a distant region, who had never seen her, and who founding a claim to an establishment in Italy upon oracles and prophecies, embroils the country in war, kills the lover of Lavinia, and proves the occasion of her mother's death. Such a plan is not fortunately laid, for disposing us to be favourable to the Hero of the Poem; and the defect might have been easily remedied, by the Poet's making Æneas, instead of distressing Lavinia, deliver her from the persecution of some rival who was odious to her, and to the whole country.

But, notwithstanding these defects, which it was necessary to remark, Virgil possesses beauties which have justly drawn the admiration of ages, and which, to this day, hold the balance in equilibrium between his fame and that of Homer. The principal and distinguishing excellency of Virgil, and which, in my opinion, he possesses beyond all Poets, is Tenderness. Nature had endowed him with exquisite sensibility; he felt every affecting circumstance in the scenes he describes; and, by a single stroke, he knows how to reach the heart. This, in an Epic Poem, is the merit next to sublimity; and puts it in an Author's power to render his Composition extremely interesting to all Readers.

The chief beauty, of this kind, in the Iliad, is, the interview of Hector with Andromache. But, in the Æneid, there are many such. The second book is one of the greatest master-pieces that ever was executed by any hand; and Virgil seems to have put forth there the whole strength of his genius, as the subject afforded a variety of scenes, both of the awful and tender kind. The images of horror, presented by a city burned and sacked in the night, are finely mixed with pathetic and affecting incidents. Nothing in any Poet, is more beautifully described than the death of old Priam; and the family-pieces of Æneas, Anchises, and Creusa, are as tender as can be conceived. In many passages of the Æneid, the same pathetic spirit shines; and they have been always the favourite passages in that work. The fourth book, for instance, relating the unhappy passion and death of Dido has been always most justly admired, and abounds with beauties of the highest kind. The interview of Æneas with Andromache and Helenus, in the third book; the Episodes of Pallas and Evander, of Nisus and Euryalus, of Lausus and Mezentius, in the Italian wars, are all striking instances of the Poet's power of raising the tender emotions. For we must observe, that though the Æneid be an unequal Poem, and, in some places, languid, yet there are beauties scattered through it all; and not a few, even in the last six books. The best and most finished books, upon the whole, are, the first, the second, the fourth, the sixth, the seventh, the eighth, and the twelfth.

Virgil's Battles are far inferior to Homer's in point of fire and sublimity: but there is one important Episode, the Descent into Hell, in which he has outdone Homer in the Odyssey, by many degrees. There is nothing in all antiquity equal, in its kind, to the sixth book of the Æneid. The scenery and the objects are great and striking, and fill the mind with that solemn awe, which was to be expected from a view of the invisible world. There runs through the whole description, a certain philosophical sublime; which Virgil's Platonic Genius, and the enlarged ideas of the Augustan age, enabled him to support with a degree of majesty, far beyond what the rude ideas of Homer's age suffered him to attain. With regard to the sweetness and beauty of Virgil's numbers, throughout his whole works, they are so well known, that it were needless to enlarge in the praise of them.

Upon the whole, as to the comparative merit of these two great princes of Epic Poetry, Homer and Virgil; the former must, undoubtedly, be admitted to be the greater Genius; the latter, to be the more correct Writer. Homer was an original in his art, and discovers both the beauties and the defects which are to be expected in an original Author, compared with those who succeed him; more boldness, more nature and ease, more sublimity and force; but greater irregularities and negligences in Composition. Virgil has, all along, kept his eye upon Homer; in many places, he has not so much imitated, as he has literally translated him. The description of the Storm, for instance, in the first Æneid, and Æneas's speech upon that occasion, are translations from the fifth book of the Odyssey; not to mention almost all the similies of Virgil, which are no other than copies of those of Homer. The pre-eminence in invention, therefore, must, beyond doubt, be ascribed to Homer. As to the pre-eminence in judgment, though many Critics are disposed to give it to Virgil, yet, in my opinion, it hangs doubtful. In Homer, we discern all the Greek vivacity; in Virgil, all the Roman stateliness. Homer's imagination is by much the most rich and copious; Virgil's, the most chaste and correct. The strength of the former lies in his power of warming the fancy; that of the latter, in his power of touching the heart. Homer's style is more simple and animated; Virgil's more elegant and uniform. The first has, on many occasions, a sublimity to which the latter never attains; but the latter, in return, never sinks below a certain degree of Epic dignity, which cannot so clearly be pronounced of the former. Not however, to detract from the admiration due to both these great Poets, most of Homer's defects may reasonably be imputed, not to his genius, but to the manners of the age in which he lived; and for the feeble passages of the Æneid, this excuse ought to be admitted, that the Æneid was left an unfinished work.

LECTURE XLIV.

LUCAN'S PHARSALIA — TASSO'S JERUSALEM — CAMOENS' LUSIAD — FENELON'S TELEMACHUS — VOLTAIRE'S HENRIADE — MILTON'S
PARADISE LOST.

AFTER Homer and Virgil, the next great Epic Poet of ancient times, who presents himself, is Lucan. He is a Poet who deserves our attention, on account of a very peculiar mixture of great beauties with great faults. Though his Pharsalia discover too little invention, and be conducted in too historical a manner, to be accounted a perfectly regular Epic Poem, yet it were the mere squeamishness of Criticism, to exclude it from the Epic class. The boundaries, as I formerly remarked, are far from being ascertained by any such precise limit, that we must refuse the Epic name to a Poem, which treats of great and heroic adventures, because it is not exactly conformable to the plans of Homer and Virgil. The subject of the Pharsalia carries, undoubtedly, all the Epic Grandeur and Dignity; neither does it want unity of object, viz. the Triumph of Cæsar over the Roman Liberty. As it stands at present, it is, indeed, brought to no proper close. But either time has deprived us of the last books, or it has been left by the Author an incomplete work.

Though Lucan's subject be abundantly heroic, yet I cannot reckon him happy in the choice of it. It has two defects. The one is, that civil wars, especially when as fierce and cruel as those of the Romans, present too many shocking objects to be fit for Epic Poetry, and give odious and disgusting views of human nature. Gallant and honourable achievements furnish a more proper theme for the Epic Muse. But Lucan's Genius, it must be confessed, seems to delight in savage scenes; he dwells upon them too much; and, not content with those which his subject naturally furnished, he goes out of his way to introduce a long Episode of Marius and Sylla's proscriptions, which abounds with all the forms of atrocious cruelty.

The other defect of Lucan's subject is, its being too near the times in which he lived. This is a circumstance, as I observed in a former Lecture, always unfortunate for a Poet; as it deprives him of the assistance of fiction and machinery, and thereby renders his work less splendid and amusing. Lucan has submitted to this disadvantage of his subject; and in doing so, has acted with more propriety, than if he had made an unseasonable attempt to embellish it with machinery; for the fables of the Gods would have made a very unnatural mixture with the exploits of Cæsar and Pompey; and instead of raising, would have diminished the dignity of such recent and well-known facts.

With regard to characters, Lucan draws them with spirit and with force. But, though Pompey be his professed Hero, he does not succeed in interesting us much in his favour. Pompey is not made to possess any high distinction, either for magnanimity in sentiment, or bravery in action; but, on the contrary, is always eclipsed by the superior abilities of Cæsar. Cato is, in truth, Lucan's favourite character, and wherever he introduces him, he appears to rise above himself. Some of the noblest, and most conspicuous passages in the work, are such as relate to Cato; either speeches put into his mouth, or descriptions of his behaviour. His speech, in particular, to Labienus, who urged him to enquire at the Oracle of Jupiter Ammon, concerning the issue of the war [book ix. 564.], deserves to be remarked, as equal, for Moral Sublimity, to any thing that is to be found in all antiquity.

In the conduct of the story, our Author has attached himself too much to chronological order. This renders the thread of his narration broken and interrupted, and makes him hurry us too often from place to place. He is too digressive also; frequently turning aside from his subject, to give us, sometimes, geographical descriptions of a country; sometimes, philosophical disquisitions concerning natural objects.

as, concerning the African Serpents, in the ninth book, and the sources of the Nile in the tenth.

There are, in the Pharsalia, several very poetical and spirited descriptions. But the Author's chief strength does not lie, either in Narration or Description. His Narration is often dry and harsh: his Descriptions are often overwrought, and employed too much upon disagreeable objects. His principal merit consists in his sentiments, which are generally noble and striking, and expressed in that glowing and ardent manner, which peculiarly distinguishes him. Lucan is the most philosophical, and the most public-spirited Poet of all antiquity. He was the nephew of the famous Seneca, the Philosopher; was himself a Stoic; and the spirit of that Philosophy breathes throughout his Poem. We must observe too, that he is the only ancient Epic Poet whom the subject of his Poem really and deeply interested. Lucan recounted no fiction. He was a Roman, and had felt all the direful effects of the Roman civil wars, and of that severe despotism which succeeded the loss of liberty. His high and bold spirit made him enter deeply into this subject, and kindle, on many occasions, into the most real warmth. Hence, he abounds in exclamations and apostrophes, which are, almost always, well-timed, and supported with a vivacity and fire that do him no small honour.

But it is the fate of this Poet, that his beauties can never be mentioned, without their suggesting his blemishes also. As his principal excellency is a lively and glowing genius, which appears sometimes in his descriptions, and very often in his sentiments, his great defect in both is, want of moderation. He carries every thing to an extreme. He knows not where to stop. From an effort to aggrandise his objects, he becomes tumid and unnatural: and it frequently happens, that where the second line of one of his descriptions is sublime, the third, in which he meant to rise still higher, is perfectly bombast. Lucan lived in an age, when the Schools of the Declaimers had begun to corrupt the Eloquence and Taste of Rome. He was not free from the infection, and too often, instead of shewing the genius of the Poet, betrays the spirit of the Declaimer.

On the whole, however, he is an Author of lively and original genius. His sentiments are so high, and his fire, on occasions, so great, as to atone for many of his defects; and passages may be produced from him, which are inferior to none in any Poet whatever. The characters, for instance, which he draws of Pompey and Cæsar in the first Book, are masterly; and the comparison of Pompey to the aged decaying oak, is highly poetical:

— totus popularibus auris
Impelli, plausuque sui gaudere theatri;
Nec reparare novas vires, multumque priori
Credere fortunæ; stat magni nominis umbra.
Qualis, frugifero quercus sublimis in agro,
Exuvias veteres populi, sacrataque gestans
Dona ducum: nec jam validis radicibus hærens,
Pondere fixa suo est; nudosque per aëra ramos
Effundens, trunco, non frondibus, efficit umbram.
At quamvis primo nutet casura sub Euro,
Et circum sylvæ firmo se robore tollant,
Sola tamen colitur. Sed non in Cæsare tantum
Nomen erat, nec fama ducis; sed nescia virtus
Stare loco; solusque pudor non vincere bello;
Acer et indomitus.*

L. I. 32

* With gifts and liberal bounty sought for fame,
And lov'd to hear the vulgar shout his name;

But when we consider the whole execution of his Poem, we are obliged to pronounce, that his poetical fire was not under the government of either sound judgment, or correct taste. His genius had strength, but not tenderness; nothing of what may be called amœnity, or sweetness. In his Style, there is abundance of force; but a mixture of harshness, and frequently of obscurity, occasioned by his desire of

In his own theatre rejoic'd to sit,
 Amidst the noisy praises of the pit.
 Careless of future ills that might betide,
 No aid he sought to prop his falling side,
 But on his former fortune much rely'd.
 Still seem'd he to possess, and fill his place;
 But stood the shadow of what once he was.
 So, in the field with Ceres' bounty spread,
 Uprears some ancient oak his rev'rend head:
 Chaplets, and sacred gifts his boughs adorn,
 And spoils of war by mighty heroes worn;
 But the first vigour of his root now gone,
 He stands dependant on his weight alone;
 All bare his naked branches are display'd,
 And with his leafless trunk he forms a shade.
 Yet though the winds his ruin daily threat,
 As every blast would heave him from his seat;
 Though thousand fairer trees the field supplies,
 That rich in youthful verdure round him rise,
 Fix'd in his ancient seat, he yields to none,
 And wears the honours of the grove alone.
 But Cæsar's greatness, and his strength was more,
 Than past renown and antiquated power;
 'Twas not the fame of what he once had been,
 Or tales in old records or annals seen;
 But 'twas a valour, restless, unconfin'd,
 Which no success could sate, nor limits bind;
 'Twas shame, a soldier's shame, untaught to yield,
 That blush'd for nothing but an ill-fought field, Rowe.

expressing himself in a pointed and unusual manner. Compared with Virgil, he may be allowed to have more fire and higher sentiments, but in every thing else, falls infinitely below him, particularly in purity, elegance, and tenderness.

As Statius and Silius Italicus, though they be Poets of the Epic Class, are too inconsiderable for particular criticism, I proceed next to Tasso, the most distinguished Epic Poet in Modern Ages.

His Jerusalem Delivered, was published in the year 1574. It is a Poem regularly and strictly Epic, in its whole construction; and adorned with all the beauties that belong to that species of Composition. The subject is, the Recovery of Jerusalem from the Infidels, by the united powers of Christendom; which, in itself, and more especially according to the ideas of Tasso's age, was a splendid, venerable, and heroic enterprise. The opposition of the Christians to the Saracens, forms an interesting contrast. The subject produces none of those fierce and shocking scenes of civil discord, which hurt the mind in Lucan, but exhibits the efforts of zeal and bravery, inspired by an honourable object. The share which Religion possesses in the enterprise, both tends to render it more august, and opens a natural field for machinery, and sublime description. The action too lies in a country, and at a period of time, sufficiently remote to allow an intermixture of fabulous tradition and fiction with true History.

In the conduct of the story, Tasso has shown a rich and fertile invention, which, in a Poet, is a capital quality. He is full of events; and those too abundantly various, and diversified in their kind. He never allows us to be tired by mere war and fighting. He frequently shifts the scene; and, from camps and battles, transports us to more pleasing objects. Sometimes the solemnities of religion; sometimes the intrigues of love; at other times, the adventures of a journey, or even the incidents of pastoral life, relieve and entertain the Reader. At the same time, the whole work is artfully connected, and while there is much variety in the parts there is perfect unity in the plan. The recovery of Jerusalem is the object kept in view through the whole, and with it the Poem closes. All the Episodes, if we except that of Olindo and Sophronia, in the Second Book, on which I formerly passed a censure, are sufficiently related to the main subject of the Poem.

The Poem is enlivened with a variety of characters, and those too both clearly marked and well supported. Godfrey, the leader of the enterprise, prudent, moderate, brave; Tancred, amorous, generous, and gallant, and well contrasted with the fierce and brutal Argantes; Rinaldo, (who is properly the Hero of the Poem, and is in part copied after Homer's Achilles,) passionate and resentful, seduced by the allurements of Armida; but a personage, on the whole, of much zeal, honour, and heroism. The brave and high-minded Solyman, the tender Erminia, the artful and violent Armida, the masculine Clorinda, are all of them well drawn and animated figures. In the characteristical part, Tasso is indeed remarkably distinguished; he is, in this respect, superior to Virgil; and yields to no Poet, except Homer.

He abounds very much with Machinery; and in this part of the work his merit is more dubious. Wherever celestial beings are made to interpose, his machinery is noble. God looking down upon the hosts, and, on different occasions, sending an Angel to check the Pagans, and to rebuke the evil spirits, produces a sublime effect. The description of Hell too, with the appearance and speech of Satan, in the beginning of the Fourth Book, is extremely striking; and plainly has been imitated by Milton, though he must be allowed to have improved upon it. But the devils, the enchanters, and the conjurers, act too great a part throughout Tasso's Poem; and form a sort of dark and gloomy machinery, not pleasing to the imagination. The enchanted wood, on which the Nodus, or Intrigue of the Poem, is made in a great measure to depend; the messengers sent in quest of Rinaldo, in order that he may break the charm; their being conducted by a Hermit to a Cave in the centre of the earth; the wonderful voyage which they make to the Fortunate Islands; and their recovering Rinaldo from the charms of Armida and voluptuousness; are scenes which, though very amusing, and described with the highest beauty of Poetry, yet must be confessed to carry the marvellous to a degree of extravagance.

In general, that for which Tasso is most liable to censure, is a certain romantic vein, which runs through many of the adventures and incidents of his Poem. The objects which he presents to us are always great; but sometimes too remote from probability. He retains somewhat of the taste of his age, which was not reclaimed from an extravagant admiration of the stories of Knight-Errantry; stories, which the wild, but rich and agreeable imagination of Ariosto, had raised into fresh reputation. In apology, however, for Tasso, it may be said, that he is not more marvellous and romantic than either Homer or Virgil. All the difference is, that in the one we find the Romance of Paganism, in the other that of Chivalry.

With all the beauties of description, and of Poetical Style, Tasso remarkably abounds. Both his descriptions, and his Style, are much diversified, and well suited to each other. In describing magnificent objects, his Style is firm and majestic; when he descends to gay and pleasing ones, such as Erminia's Pastoral Retreat in the Seventh Book, and the Arts and Beauty of Armida in the Fourth Book, it is soft and insinuating. Both those descriptions, which I have mentioned, are exquisite in their kind. His battles are animated, and very properly varied in the incidents; inferior however to Homer's in point of spirit and fire.

In his sentiments, Tasso is not so happy as in his descriptions. It is indeed rather by actions, characters, and descriptions, that he interests us, than by the sentimental part of the work. He is far inferior to Virgil in tenderness. When he aims at being pathetic and sentimental in his speeches, he is apt to become artificial and strained.

With regard to points and conceits, with which he has often been reproached, the censure has been carried too far. Affectation is by no means the general character of Tasso's manner, which, upon the whole, is masculine, strong, and correct. On some occasions, indeed, especially, as I just now observed, when he seeks to be tender, he degenerates into forced and unnatural ideas; but these are far from being so frequent or common as has been supposed. Threescore or fourscore lines retrenched from the Poem, would fully clear it, I am persuaded, of all such exceptionable passages.

With Boileau, Dacier, and the other French critics of the last age, the humour prevailed of decrying Tasso; and passed from them to some of the English Writers. But one would be apt to imagine, they were not much acquainted with Tasso; or at least they must have read him under the influence of strong prejudices. For to me it appears clear, that the Jerusalem is, in rank and dignity, the third regular Epic Poem in the World; and comes next to the Iliad and Æneid. Tasso may be justly held inferior to Homer, in simplicity and in fire; to Virgil, in tenderness; to Milton, in daring sublimity of genius; but to no other he yields in any poetical talents; and for fertility of invention, variety of incidents, expression of characters, richness of description, and beauty of Style, I know no Poet, except the three just named, that can be compared to him.

Ariosto, the great rival of Tasso in Italian Poetry, cannot, with any propriety, be classed among the Epic Writers. The fundamental rule of Epic Composition is, to recount an heroic enterprise, and to form it into a regular story. Though there is a sort of unity and connection in the plan of Orlando Furioso, yet, instead of rendering this apparent to the Reader, it seems to have been the Author's intention to keep it out of view, by the desultory manner in which the Poem is carried on, and the perpetual interruptions of the several stories before they are finished. Ariosto appears to have despised all regularity of plan, and to have chosen to give loose reins to a copious and rich but extravagant fancy. At the same time, there is so much Epic matter in the Orlando Furioso, that it would be improper to pass it by without some notice. It unites indeed all sorts of Poetry; sometimes comic and satiric; sometimes light and licentious; at other times, highly heroic, descriptive and tender. Whatever strain the Poet assumes, he excels in it. He is always master of his subject; seems to play himself with it, and leaves us sometimes at a loss to know whether he be serious or in jest. He is seldom dramatic; sometimes, but not often, sentimental; but in narration and description, perhaps no Poet ever went beyond him. He makes every scene which he describes, and every event which he relates, pass before our eyes; and in his selection of circumstances, is eminently picturesque. His Style is much varied, always suited to the subject, and adorned with a remarkably smooth and melodious Versification.

As the Italians make their boast of Tasso, so do the Portuguese of Camoens; who was nearly cotemporary with Tasso, but whose Poem was published before the Jerusalem. The subject of it is the first discovery of the East Indies by Vasco de Gama; an enterprise splendid in its nature, and extremely interesting to the countrymen of Camoens; as it laid the foundation of their future wealth and consideration in Europe. The Poem opens with Vasco and his fleet appearing on the ocean, between the Island Madagascar, and the Coast of Æthiopia. After various attempts to land on that coast, they are at last hospitably received in the kingdom of Melinda. Vasco, at the desire of the King, gives him an account of Europe, recites a poetical History of Portugal, and relates all the adventures of the voyage, which had preceded the opening of the Poem.

This recital takes up three Cantos, or Books. It is well imagined; contains a great many poetical beauties; and has no defect, except that Vasco makes an unseasonable display of learning to the African Prince, in frequent allusions to the Greek and Roman Histories. Vasco and his countrymen afterwards set forth to pursue their voyage. The storms and distresses which they encounter; their arrival at Calecut, on the Malabar Coast; their reception and adventures in that country, and at last their return homewards, fill up the rest of the Poem.

The whole work is conducted according to the Epic plan. Both the subject and the incidents are magnificent; and joined with some wildness and irregularity, there appear in the execution much poetic spirit, strong fancy, and bold description; as far as I can judge from translations, without any knowledge of the original. There is no attempt towards painting characters in the Poem; Vasco is the Hero, and the only personage indeed that makes any figure.

The Machinery of the Lusiad is perfectly extravagant; not only is it formed of a singular mixture of Christian ideas, and Pagan mythology; but it is so conducted, that the Pagan Gods appear to be the true Deities, and Christ and the Blessed Virgin to be subordinate Agents. One great scope of the Portuguese expedition, our Author informs us, is to propagate the Christian faith, and to extirpate Mahometanism. In this religious undertaking, the great protector of the Portuguese is Venus, and their great adversary is Bacchus, whose displeasure is excited by Vasco's attempting to rival his fame in the Indies. Councils of the Gods are held, in which Jupiter is introduced, as foretelling the downfall of Mahometanism, and the propagation of the Gospel. Vasco, in great distress from a storm, prays most seriously to God; implores the aid of Christ and the Virgin, and begs for such assistance as was given to the Israelites, when they were passing through the Red Sea, and to the Apostle Paul, when he was in hazard of shipwreck. In return to this prayer, Venus appears, who discerning the storm to be the work of Bacchus, complains to Jupiter, and procures the winds to be calmed. Such strange and preposterous Machinery, shews how much Authors have been misled by the absurd opinion, that there could be no Epic Poetry without the Gods of Homer. Towards the end of the work, indeed, the Author gives us an awkward salvo for his whole Mythology; making the Goddess Thetis inform Vasco, that she, and the rest of the Heathen Deities, are no more than names to describe the operations of Providence.

There is, however, some fine Machinery of a different kind, in the Lusiad. The genius of the river Ganges, appearing to Emanuel King of Portugal, in a dream, inviting that Prince to discover his secret springs, and acquainting him that he was the destined monarch for whom the treasures of the East were reserved, is a happy idea. But the noblest conception of this sort, is in the Fifth Canto, where Vasco is recounting to the King of Melinda, all the wonders which he met with in his navigation. He tells him, that when the fleet arrived at the Cape of Good Hope, which never before had been doubled by any navigator, there appeared to them on a sudden, a huge and monstrous phantom rising out of the sea, in the midst of tempests and thunders, with a head that reached the clouds, and a countenance that filled them with terror. This was the genius, or guardian, of that hitherto unknown ocean. It spoke to them with a voice like thunder; menacing them for invading those seas which he had so long possessed undisturbed; and for daring to explore those secrets of the deep, which never had been revealed to the eye of mortals; required them to proceed no farther; if they should proceed, foretold all the successive calamities that were to befall them; and then, with a mighty noise, disappeared. This is one of the most solemn and striking pieces of Machinery that ever was employed; and is sufficient to shew that Camoens is a Poet, though of an irregular, yet of a bold and lofty imagination.*

In reviewing the Epic Poets, it were unjust to make no mention of the amiable author of the Adventures of Telemachus. His work, though not composed in Verse, is justly entitled to be held a Poem. The measured poetical Prose, in which it is written, is remarkably harmonious; and gives the Style nearly as much elevation as the French language is capable of supporting, even in regular Verse.

The plan of the work, is, in general, well contrived; and is deficient neither in Epic grandeur, nor unity of object. The Author has entered with much felicity into the spirit and ideas of the Ancient Poets, particularly into the Ancient Mythology, which retains more dignity, and makes a better figure

* I have made no mention of the Araucana, an Epic Poem, in Spanish, composed by Alonzo d'Ercilla, because I am unacquainted with the original language, and have not seen any translation of it. A full account of it is given by Mr. Hayley, in the Notes upon his Essay on Epic Poetry.

in his hands, than in those of any other Modern Poet. His descriptions are rich and beautiful; especially of the softer and calmer scenes, for which the genius of Fenelon was best suited; such as the incidents of pastoral life, the pleasures of virtue, or a country flourishing in peace. There is an inimitable sweetness and tenderness in several of the pictures of this kind, which he has given.

The best executed part of the work, is the first six books, in which Telemachus recounts his Adventures to Calypso. The Narration, throughout them, is lively and interesting. Afterwards, especially in the last twelve books, it becomes more tedious and languid; and in the warlike adventures which are attempted, there is a great defect of vigour. The chief objection against this work being classed with Epic Poems, arises from the minute details of virtuous policy into which the Author in some places enters; and from the discourses and instructions of Mentor, which recur upon us too often; and too much upon the strain of common-place morality. Though these were well suited to the main design of the Author, which was to form the mind of a young Prince, yet they seem not congruous to the nature of Epic Poetry; the object of which is to improve us by means of actions, characters, and sentiments; rather than by delivering professed and formal instruction.

Several of the Epic Poets have described a descent into Hell; and in the prospects they have given us of the invisible world, we may observe the gradual refinement of men's notions concerning a state of future rewards and punishments. The descent of Ulysses into Hell, in Homer's Odyssey, presents to us a very indistinct and dreary sort of object. The scene is laid in the country of the Cimmerians, which is always covered with clouds and darkness, at the extremity of the ocean. When the spirits of the dead begin to appear, we scarcely know whether Ulysses is above ground, or below it. None of the ghosts, even of the heroes, appear satisfied with their condition in the other world; and when Ulysses endeavours to comfort Achilles, by reminding him of the illustrious figure which he must make in those regions, Achilles roundly tells him, that all such speeches are idle; for he would rather be a day-labourer on earth, than have the command of all the dead.

In the Sixth Book of the Æneid, we discern a much greater refinement of Ideas, corresponding to the progress which the world had then made in philosophy. The objects there delineated are both more clear and distinct, and more grand and awful. The separate mansions of good and of bad spirits, with the punishments of the one, and the employments and happiness of the other, are finely described; and in consistency with the most pure morality. But the visit which Fenelon makes Telemachus pay to the shades, is much more philosophical still than Virgil's. He employs the same fables and the same mythology; but we find the ancient mythology refined by the knowledge of the true religion, and adorned with that beautiful enthusiasm, for which Fenelon was so distinguished. His account of the happiness of the just is an excellent description in the mystic strain; and very expressive of the genius and spirit of the Author.

Voltaire has given us, in his Henriade, a regular

Epic Poem, in French verse. In every performance of that celebrated Writer, we may expect to find marks of genius; and, accordingly, that work discovers, in several places, that boldness in the conceptions, and that liveliness and felicity in the expression, for which the Author is so remarkably distinguished. Several of the comparisons, in particular, which occur in it, are both new and happy. But considered upon the whole, I cannot esteem it one of his chief productions; and am of opinion, that he has succeeded infinitely better in Tragic, than in Epic Composition. French Versification seems ill adapted to Epic Poetry. Besides its being always fettered by rhyme, the language never assumes a sufficient degree of elevation or majesty; and appears to be more capable of expressing the tender in Tragedy, than of supporting the sublime in Epic. Hence a feebleness, and sometimes a prosaic flatness, in the Style of the Henriade; and whether from this, or from some other cause, the Poem often languishes. It does not seize the imagination; nor interest and carry the Reader along, with that ardour which ought to be inspired by a sublime and spirited Epic Poem.

The subject of the Henriade, is the triumph of Henry the Fourth over the arms of the League. The action of the Poem, properly includes only the Siege of Paris. It is an action perfectly Epic in its nature; great, interesting, and conducted with a sufficient regard to unity, and all the other critical rules. But it is liable to both the defects which I before remarked in Lucan's Pharsalia. It is founded wholly on civil wars; and presents to us those odious and detestable objects of massacres and assassinations, which throw a gloom over the Poem. It is also, like Lucan's, of too recent a date, and comes too much within the bounds of well-known history. To remedy this last defect, and to remove the appearance of being a mere historian, Voltaire has chosen to mix fiction with truth. The Poem, for instance, opens with a voyage of Henry's to England, and an interview between him and Queen Elizabeth; though every one knows that Henry never was in England, and that these two illustrious personages never met. In facts of such public notoriety, a fiction like this shocks the Reader, and forms an unnatural and ill-sorted mixture with historical truth. The Episode was contrived, in order to give Henry an opportunity of recounting the former transactions of the civil wars, in imitation of the recital which Æneas makes to Dido in the Æneid. But the imitation was injudicious. Æneas might, with propriety, relate to Dido, transactions of which she was either entirely ignorant, or had acquired only an imperfect knowledge by flying reports. But Queen Elizabeth could not but be supposed to be perfectly apprised of all the facts, which the Poet makes Henry recite to her.

In order to embellish his subject, Voltaire has chosen to employ a great deal of Machinery. But here, also, I am obliged to censure his conduct; for the Machinery, which he chiefly employs, is of the worst kind, and the least suited to an Epic Poem; that of allegorical beings. Discord, Cunning, and Love, appear as personages, mix with the human actors, and make a considerable figure in the intrigue of the Poem. This is contrary to every rule of rational criticism. Ghosts, Angels, and Devils have popular belief on their side, and may be conceived as existing. But every one knows, that allegorical beings are no more than representations of human dispositions and passions. They may be employed like other Personifications and Figures of Speech; or in a Poem, that is wholly allegorical, they may occupy the chief place. They are there in their native and proper region; but in a Poem which relates to human transactions, as I had occasion before to remark, when such beings are described as acting along with men, the imagination is confounded; it is divided between phantasms and realities, and knows not on what to rest.

In justice, however, to our Author, I must observe, that the Machinery of St. Louis, which he also employs, is of a better kind, and possesses real dignity. The finest passage in the Henriade, indeed, one of the finest that occurs in any Poem, is the prospect of the invisible world, which St. Louis gives to Henry in a dream, in the Seventh Canto. Death bringing the souls of the departed in succession before God; their astonishment, when, arriving from all different countries and religious sects, they are brought into the divine presence; when they find their superstitions to be false, and have the truth unveiled to them; the palace of the Destinies opened to Henry, and the prospect of his successors which is there given him; are striking and magnificent objects, and do honour to the genius of Voltaire.

Though some of the Episodes in this Poem are properly extended, yet the Narration is, on the whole, too general; the events are too much crowded, and superficially related; which is, doubtless one cause of the Poem making a faint impression. The strain of sentiment which runs through it, is high and noble.

Religion appears, on every occasion, with great and proper lustre; and the Author breathes that spirit of humanity and toleration, which is conspicuous in all his works.

Milton, of whom it remains now to speak, has chalked out for himself a new, and very extraordinary road, in Poetry. As soon as we open his Paradise Lost, we find ourselves introduced all at once into an invisible world, and surrounded with celestial and infernal beings. Angels and Devils are not the Machinery, but principal actors, in the Poem; and what, in any other composition, would be the marvellous, is here only the natural course of events. A subject so remote from the affairs of this world, may furnish ground to those who think such discussions material, to bring it into doubt, whether Paradise Lost can properly be classed among Epic Poems. By whatever name it is to be called, it is, undoubtedly, one of the highest efforts of poetical genius; and in one great characteristic of the Epic Poem, Majesty and Sublimity, it is fully equal to any that bear that name.

How far the Author was altogether happy in the choice of his subject, may be questioned. It has led him into very difficult ground: Had he taken a subject that was more human, and less theological; that was more connected with the occurrences of life; and afforded a greater display of the characters and passions of men, his Poem would, perhaps, have, to the bulk of Readers, been more pleasing and attractive. But the subject which he has chosen, suited the daring sublimity of his genius.* It is a subject for

* "He seems to have been well acquainted with his own genius, and to know what it was that nature had bestowed upon which Milton alone was fitted; and in the conduct of it, he has shown a stretch both of imagination and invention, which is perfectly wonderful. It is astonishing how, from the few hints given us in the Sacred Scriptures, he was able to raise so complete and regular a structure; and to fill his Poem with such a variety of incidents. Dry and harsh passages sometimes occur. The Author appears, upon some occasions, a Metaphysician and a Divine, rather than a Poet. But the general tenor of his work is interesting; he seizes and fixes the imagination; engages, elevates, and affects us as we proceed, which is always a sure test of merit in an Epic Composition. The artful change of his objects; the scene laid now in Earth, now in Hell, and now in Heaven, affords a sufficient diversity; while unity of plan is, at the same time, perfectly supported. We have still life, and calm scenes, in the employments of Adam and Eve in Paradise; and we have busy scenes, and great actions, in the enterprise of Satan, and the wars of the Angels. The innocence, purity, and amiableness of our first parents, opposed to the pride and ambition of Satan, furnishes a happy contrast, that reigns throughout the whole Poem; only the Conclusion, as I before observed, is too tragic for Epic Poetry.

The nature of the subject did not admit any great display of characters; but such as could be introduced,

“ him more bountifully than upon others; the power of displaying the vast, illuminating the splendid, enforcing the awful, darkening the gloomy, and aggravating the dreadful. He therefore chose a subject, on which too much could not be said; on which he might tire his fancy, without the censure of extravagance.”

Dr. JOHNSON'S Life of Milton.

are supported with much propriety. Satan, in particular, makes a striking figure, and is indeed the best drawn character in the Poem. Milton has not described him such as we suppose an infernal spirit to be. He has, more suitably to his own purpose, given him a human, that is a mixed character, not altogether void of some good qualities. He is brave and faithful to his troops. In the midst of his impiety, he is not without remorse. He is even touched with pity for our first parents; and justifies himself in his design against them, from the necessity of his situation. He is actuated by ambition and resentment, rather than by pure malice. In short, Milton's Satan is no worse than many a conspirator or factious chief that makes a figure in history. The different characters of Beelzebub, Moloch, Belial, are exceedingly well painted in those eloquent speeches which they make in the Second Book. The good Angels, though always described with dignity and propriety, have more uniformity than the infernal Spirits in their appearance; though among them, too, the dignity of Michael, the mild condescension of Raphael, and the tried fidelity of Abdiel, form proper characteristic distinctions. The attempt to describe God Almighty himself, and to recount dialogues between the Father and the Son, was too bold and arduous, and is that wherein our Poet, as was to have been expected, has been most unsuccessful. With regard to his human characters; the innocence of our first parents, and their love, are finely and delicately painted. In some of his speeches to Raphael and to Eve, Adam, is, perhaps, too knowing and refined for his situation. Eve is more distinctly characterised. Her gentleness, modesty, and frailty, mark very expressively a female character.

Milton's great and distinguishing excellence is, his sublimity. In this, perhaps, he excels Homer; as there is no doubt of his leaving Virgil, and every other Poet, far behind him. Almost the whole of the First and Second Books of Paradise Lost are continued instances of the sublime. The prospect of Hell and of the fallen Host, the appearance and behaviour of Satan, the consultation of the infernal Chiefs, and Satan's flight through Chaos to the borders of this world, discover the most lofty ideas that ever entered into the conception of any Poet. In the Sixth Book; also, there is much grandeur, particularly in the appearance of the Messiah; though some parts of that book are censurable; and the witicisms of the Devils upon the effect of their artillery, form an intolerable blemish. Milton's sublimity is of a different kind from that of Homer. Homer's is generally accompanied with fire and impetuosity; Milton's possesses more of a calm and amazing grandeur. Homer warms and hurries us along; Milton fixes us in a state of astonishment and elevation. Homer's sublimity appears most in the description of actions; Milton's, in that of wonderful and stupendous objects.

But though Milton is most distinguished for his sublimity, yet there is also much of the beautiful, the tender, and the pleasing, in many parts of his work. When the scene is laid in Paradise, the imagery is always of the most gay and smiling kind. His descriptions show an uncommonly fertile imagination; and in his similes, he is, for the most part, remarkably happy. They are seldom improperly introduced; seldom either low or trite. They generally present to us images taken from the sublime or the beautiful class of objects; if they have any faults, it is their alluding too frequently to matters of learning, and to fables of antiquity. In the latter part of Paradise Lost, there must be confessed to be a falling off. With the fall of our first parents, Milton's genius seems to decline. Beauties, however, there are, in the concluding Books of the tragic kind. The remorse and contrition of the guilty pair, and their lamentations over Paradise, when they are obliged to leave it, are very moving. The last Episode of the Angels showing Adam the fate of his posterity, is happily imagined; but, in many places, the execution is languid.

Milton's Language and Versification have high merit. His Style is full of majesty, and wonderfully adapted to his subject. His blank verse is harmonious and diversified, and affords the most complete example of the elevation which our language is capable of attaining by the force of numbers. It does not flow, like the French Verse, in tame, regular, uniform melody, which soon tires the ear; but is sometimes smooth and flowing, sometimes rough; varied in its cadence, and intermixed with discords, so as to suit the strength and freedom of Epic Composition. Neglected and prosaic lines, indeed, we sometimes meet with; but, in a work so long, and in the main so harmonious, these may be forgiven.

On the whole, Paradise Lost is a Poem that abounds with beauties of every kind, and that justly entitles its Author to a degree of fame not inferior to any Poet; though it must be also admitted to have many inequalities. It is the lot of almost every high and daring genius, not to be uniform and correct. Milton is too frequently theological and metaphysical ; sometimes harsh in his language ; often too technical in his words, and affectedly ostentatious of his learning. Many of his faults must be attributed to the pedantry of the age in which he lived. He discovers a vigour, a grasp of genius equal to every thing that is great ; if at some times he falls much below himself, at other times he rises above every Poet, of the ancient or modern world.

LECTURE XLV.

DRAMATIC POETRY — TRAGEDY.

DRAMATIC Poetry has, among all civilized nations, been considered as a rational and useful entertainment, and judged worthy of careful and serious discussion. According as it is employed upon the light and the gay, or upon the grave and affecting incidents of human life, it divides itself into the two forms of Comedy or Tragedy. But as great and serious objects command more attention than little and ludicrous ones ; as the fall of a Hero interests the public more than the marriage of a private person ; Tragedy has been always held a more dignified entertainment than Comedy. The one rests upon the high passions, the virtues, crimes, and sufferings of mankind ; the other on their humours, follies, and pleasures. Terror and pity are the great instruments of the former; ridicule is the sole instrument of the latter. Tragedy shall therefore be the object of our fullest discussion. This and the following lecture shall be employed on it; after which I shall treat of what is peculiar to Comedy.

Tragedy, considered as an exhibition of the characters and behaviour of men in some of the most trying and critical situations of life, is a noble idea of Poetry. It is a direct imitation of human manners and actions. For it does not, like the Epic Poem, exhibit characters by the narration and description of the Poet; but the Poet disappears; and the personages themselves are set before us, acting and speaking what is suitable to their characters. Hence, no kind of writing is so great a trial of the Author's profound knowledge of the human heart. No kind of writing has so much power, when happily executed, to raise the strongest emotions. It is, or ought to be, a mirror in which we behold ourselves, and the evils to which we are exposed; a faithful copy of the human passions, with all their direful effects, when they are suffered to become extravagant.

As Tragedy is a high and distinguished species of Composition, so also, in its general strain and spirit, it is favourable to virtue. Such power hath virtue happily over the human mind, by the wise and gracious constitution of our nature, that as admiration cannot be raised in Epic Poetry, so neither in Tragic Poetry can our passions be strongly moved, unless virtuous emotions be awakened within us. Every Poet finds, that it is impossible to interest us in any character, without representing that character as worthy and honourable, though it may not be perfect, and that the great secret for raising indignation, is to paint the person who is to be the object of it, in the colours of vice and depravity. He may, indeed; nay, he must, represent the virtuous as sometimes unfortunate, because this is often the case in real life; but he will always study to engage our hearts in their behalf; and though they may be described as unprosperous, yet there is no instance of a Tragic Poet representing vice as fully triumphant and happy in the catastrophe of the Piece. Even when bad men succeed in their designs, punishment is made always to attend them; and misery of one kind or other is shewn to be unavoidably connected with guilt. Love and admiration of virtuous characters, compassion for the injured and the distressed, and indignation against the authors of their sufferings, are the sentiments most generally excited by Tragedy. And, therefore, though Dramatic Writers may sometimes, like other Writers, be guilty of improprieties, though they may fail of placing virtue precisely in the due point of light, yet no reasonable person can deny Tragedy to be a moral species of Composition. Taking Tragedies complexly, I am fully persuaded, that the impressions left by them upon the mind, are, on the whole, favourable to virtue and good dispositions. And, therefore, the zeal which some pious men have shown against the entertainments of the Theatre must rest only upon the abuse of Comedy; which, indeed, has frequently been so great as to justify very severe censures against it.

The account which Aristotle gives of the design of Tragedy is, that it is intended to purge our passions by means of pity and terror. This is somewhat obscure. Various senses have been put upon his words, and much altercation has followed among his commentators. Without entering into any controversy upon this head, the intention of Tragedy may, I think, be more shortly and clearly defined, to improve our virtuous sensibility. If an Author interests us in behalf of virtue, forms us to compassion for the distressed, inspires us with proper sentiments, on beholding the vicissitudes of life, and, by means of the concern which he raises for the misfortunes of others, leads us to guard against errors in our own conduct, he accomplishes all the moral purposes of Tragedy.

In order to this end, the first requisite is, that he choose some moving and interesting story, and that he conduct it in a natural and probable manner. For we must observe, that the natural and the probable must always be the basis of Tragedy; and are infinitely more important there, than in Epic Poetry. The object of the Epic Poet is to excite our admiration by the recital of heroic adventures; and a much slighter degree of probability is required when admiration is concerned, than when the tender passions are intended to be moved. The imagination, in the former case, is exalted, accommodates itself to the Poet's idea, and can admit the marvellous without being shocked. But Tragedy demands a stricter imitation of the life and actions of men. For the end which it pursues is, not so much to elevate imagination, as to affect the heart; and the heart always judges more nicely than the imagination, of what is probable. Passion can be raised, only by making the impressions of nature, and of truth, upon the mind. By introducing, therefore, any wild or romantic circumstances into his Story, the Poet never fails to check passion in its growth, and, of course, disappoints the main effect of Tragedy.

This principle, which is founded on the clearest reason, excludes from Tragedy all Machinery, or fabulous intervention of the Gods. Ghosts have, indeed, maintained their place; as being strongly founded on popular belief, and peculiarly suited to heighten the terror of Tragic Scenes. But all unravelings of the Plot, which turn upon the interposition of Deities, such as Euripides employs in several of his plays, are much to be condemned; both as clumsy and inartificial, and as destroying the probability of the Story. This mixture of Machinery, with the Tragic Action, is undoubtedly a blemish in the Ancient Theatre.

In order to promote that impression of probability which is so necessary to the success of Tragedy, some Critics have required, that the subject should never be a pure fiction invented by the Poet, but built on real history, or known facts. Such, indeed, were generally, if not always, the subjects of the Greek Tragedians. But I cannot hold this to be a matter of any great consequence. It is proved by experience, that a fictitious tale, if properly conducted, will melt the heart as much as any real history. In order to our being moved, it is not necessary that the events related did actually happen, provided they be such as might easily have happened in the ordinary course of nature. Even when Tragedy borrows its materials from History, it mixes many a fictitious circumstance. The greatest part of Readers neither know, nor enquire, what is fabulous, or what is historical, in the subject. They attend only to what is probable, and are touched by events which resemble nature.

Accordingly, some of the most pathetic Tragedies are entirely fictitious in the subject; such as Voltaire's Zaire and Alzire, the Orphan, Douglas, the Fair Penitent, and several others.

Whether the subject be of the real or feigned kind, that on which most depends for rendering the incidents in a Tragedy probable, and by means of their probability affecting, is the conduct or management of the Story, and the connection of its several parts. To regulate this conduct, Critics have laid down the famous rule of the three Unities; the importance of which it will be necessary to discuss. But, in order to do this with more advantage, it will be necessary, that we first look backwards, and trace the rise and origin of Tragedy, which will give light to several things relating to the subject.

Tragedy, like other arts, was, in its beginning, rude and imperfect. Among the Greeks, from whom our Dramatic Entertainments are derived, the origin of Tragedy was no other than the Song which was wont to be sung at the festival of Bacchus. A goat was the sacrifice offered to that God; after the sacrifice, the Priests, with the company that joined them, sung hymns in honour of Bacchus; and from the name of the victim, τραγος a Goat, joined with ᾠδή a Song, undoubtedly arose the word Tragedy.

These Hymns, or Lyric Poems, were sung sometimes by the whole company, sometimes by separate bands, answering alternately to each other; making what we call a Chorus, with its Strophes and Antistrophes. In order to throw some variety into this entertainment, and to relieve the Singers, it was thought proper to introduce a person who, between the Songs, should make a recitation in Verse. These pis, who lived about 536 years before the Christian æra, made this innovation; and as it was relished, Æschylus, who came 50 years after him, and who is properly the father of Tragedy, went a step farther, introduced a Dialogue between two persons, or actors, in which he contrived to interweave some interesting story, and brought his actors on a Stage, adorned with proper scenery and decorations. All that these actors recited, was called Episode, or additional Song; and the Songs of the Chorus were made to relate no longer to Bacchus, their original subject, but to the story in which the actors were concerned. This began to give the Drama a regular form, which was soon after brought to perfection by Sophocles and Euripides. It is remarkable, in how short a space of time Tragedy grew up among the Greeks, from the rudest beginnings to its most perfect state. For Sophocles, the greatest and most correct of all the Tragic Poets, flourished only 22 years after Æschylus, and was little more than 70 years posterior to Thespis.

From the account which I have now given, it appears that the Chorus was the basis or foundation of the ancient Tragedy. It was not an ornament added to it; or a contrivance designed to render it more perfect; but, in truth, the Dramatic Dialogue was an addition to the Chorus, which was the original entertainment. In process of time, the Chorus, from being the principal, became only the accessory in Tragedy; till at last, in Modern Tragedy, it has disappeared altogether; which forms the chief distinction between the Ancient and the Modern Stage.

This has given rise to a question much agitated between the partizans of the Ancients and the Moderns, whether the Drama has gained, or has suffered, by the abolition of the Chorus? It must be admitted, that the Chorus tended to render Tragedy both more magnificent and more instructive and moral. It was always the most sublime and poetical part of the work; and being carried on by singing, and accompanied with music, it must, no doubt, have diversified the Entertainment greatly, and added to its splendour. The Chorus, at the same time, conveyed constant lessons of virtue. It was composed of such persons as might most naturally be supposed present on the occasion; inhabitants of the place where the scene was laid, often the companions of some of the principal actors, and therefore, in some degree, interested in the issue of the action. This company, which, in the days of Sophocles, was restricted to the number of fifteen persons, was constantly on the Stage, during the whole performance, mingled in discourse with the actors, entered into their concerns, suggested counsel and advice to them, moralised on all the incidents that were going on, and during the intervals of the action, sung their Odes, or Songs, in which they addressed the Gods, prayed for success to the virtuous, lamented their misfortunes, and delivered many religious and moral sentiments.*

* The office of the Chorus is thus described by Horace:

Actoris partes Chorus, officiumque virile
 Defendat; neu quid medios intercinat actus,
 Quod non proposito conducat, et hæreat aptè.
 Ille bonis faveatque, et concilietur amicis,
 Et regat iratos, et amet peccare timentes :
 Ille dapas laudet mensæ brevis; ille salubrem
 Justitiam, legesque, & apertis otia portis.

But, notwithstanding the advantages which were obtained by means of the Chorus, the inconveniences on the other side are so great, as to render the modern practice of excluding the Chorus far more eligible upon the whole. For if a natural and probable imitation of human actions be the chief end of the Drama; no other persons ought to be brought on the Stage, than those who are necessary to the Dramatic action. The introduction of an adventitious company of persons, who have but a slight concern in the business of the Play, is unnatural in itself, embarrassing to the Poet, and, though it may render the spectacle splendid, tends, undoubtedly, to render it more cold and uninteresting, because more unlike a real transaction. The mixture of Music, or Song, on the part of the Chorus, with the Dialogue carried on by the Actors, is another unnatural circumstance; removing the representation still farther from the resemblance of

Ille tegat commissa; deosque precetur, et orèt
Ut redeat miseris, abeat fortuna superbis.

DE ART. POET. 19,

The Chorus must support an actor's part;
Defend the virtuous, and advise with art;
Govern the choleric, and the proud appease,
And the short feasts of frugal tables praise;
Applaud the justice of well-governed states,
And peace triumphant with her open gates.
Intrusted secrets let them ne'er betray,
But to the righteous Gods with ardour pray,
That fortune, with returning smiles, may bless
Afflicted worth, and impious pride depress;
Yet let their songs with apt coherence join,
Promote the plot, and aid the just design.

FRANCIS.

life. The Poet, besides, is subjected to innumerable difficulties in so contriving his plan, that the presence of the Chorus, during all the incidents of the Play, shall consist with any probability. The scene must be constantly, and often absurdly, laid in some public place, that the Chorus may be supposed to have free access to it. To many things that ought to be transacted in private, the Chorus must ever be witnesses; they must be the confederates of both parties, who come successively upon the Stage, and who are, perhaps, conspiring against each other. In short, the management of a Chorus is an unnatural confinement to a Poet; it requires too great a sacrifice of probability in the conduct of the action; it has too much the air of a theatrical decoration, to be consistent with that appearance of reality, which a Poet must ever preserve in order to move our Passions. The origin of Tragedy among the Greeks, we have seen was a choral Song, or Hymn to the Gods. There is no wonder, therefore, that on the Greek Stage it so long maintained possession. But it may confidently, I think, be asserted, that, if, instead of the Dramatic Dialogue having been superadded to the Chorus, the Dialogue itself had been the first invention, the Chorus would, in that case, never have been thought of.

One use, I am of opinion, might still be made of the Ancient Chorus, and would be a considerable improvement of the Modern Theatre; if, instead of that unmeaning, and often improperly chosen Music, with which the Audience is entertained in the intervals between the Acts, a Chorus were then to be introduced, whose Music and Songs, though forming no part of the Play, should have a relation to the incidents of the preceding act, and to the dispositions which those incidents are presumed to have awakened in the Spectators. By this means the tone of passion would be kept up without interruption; and all the good effects of the ancient Chorus might be preserved, for inspiring proper sentiments, and for increasing the morality of the Performance, without those inconveniences which arose from the Chorus forming a constituent part of the Play, and mingling unseasonably, and unnaturally, with the personages of the Drama.

After the view which we have taken of the rise of Tragedy, and of the nature of the Ancient Chorus, with the advantages and inconveniences attending it, our way is cleared for examining, with more advantage, the Three Unities of Action, Place and Time; which have generally been considered as essential to the proper conduct of the Dramatic Fable.

Of these three, the first, Unity of Action, is, beyond doubt, far the most important. In treating of Epic Poetry, I have already explained the nature of it; as consisting in a relation which all the incidents introduced bear to some design or effect, so as to combine naturally into one whole. This unity of subject is still more essential to Tragedy, than it is to Epic Poetry. For a multiplicity of Plots, or Actions, crowded into so short a space as Tragedy allows, must, of necessity, distract the attention, and prevent passion from rising to any height. Nothing, therefore, is worse conduct in a Tragic Poet, than to carry on two independent actions in the same Play; the effect of which is, that the mind being suspended and divided between them, cannot give itself up entirely either to the one or the other.

There may, indeed, be underplots; that is, the persons introduced, may have different pursuits and designs; but the Poet's art must be shown in managing these, so as to render them subservient to the main action. They ought to be connected with the catastrophe of the Play, and to conspire in bringing it forward. If there be any intrigue which stands separate and independent, and which may be left out without affecting the unravelling of the Plot, we may always conclude this to be a faulty violation of Unity. Such Episodes are not permitted here, as in Epic Poetry.

We have a clear example of this defect in Mr. Addison's Cato. The subject of this Tragedy is, the death of Cato; and a very noble personage Cato is, and supported by the Author with much dignity. But all the love scenes in the Play; the passion of Cato's two sons for Lucia, and that of Juba for Cato's daughter, are mere Episodes; have no connection with the principal action, and no effect upon it. The Author thought his subject too barren in incidents, and in order to diversify it, he has given us, as it were, by the bye, a history of the amours that were going on in Cato's family; by which he hath both broken the unity of his subject, and formed a very unseasonable junction of gallantry, with the high sentiments, and public-spirited passions which predominate in other parts, and which the Play was chiefly designed to display.

We must take care not to confound the Unity of the Action with the Simplicity of the Plot. Unity and Simplicity import different things in Dramatic composition. The plot is said to be Simple, when a small number of incidents are introduced into it.

But it may be implex, as the Critics term it, that is, it may include a considerable number of persons and events, and yet not be deficient in Unity; provided all the incidents be made to tend towards the principal object of the Play, and be properly connected with it. All the Greek Tragedies not only maintain Unity in the Action, but are remarkably simple in the Plot; to such a degree, indeed, as sometimes to appear to us too naked, and destitute of interesting events. In the Œdipus Coloneus, for instance, of Sophocles, the whole subject is no more than this: Œdipus, blind and miserable, wanders to Athens, and wishes to die there; Creon and his son Polynices, arrive at the same time, and endeavour, separately, to persuade the old man to return to Thebes, each with a view to his own interest; he will not go; Theseus, the King of Athens, protects him; and the Play ends with his death. In the Philoctetes of the same Author, the Plot or Fable, is nothing more than Ulysses, and the son of Achilles, studying to persuade the diseased Philoctetes to leave his uninhabited island, and go with them to Troy; which he refuses to do, till Hercules, whose arrows he possessed, descends from Heaven and commands him. Yet these simple, and seemingly barren subjects, are wrought up with so much art by Sophocles, as to become very tender and affecting.

Among the Moderns, much greater variety of events has been admitted into Tragedy. It has become more the theatre of passion than it was among the Ancients. A greater display of characters is attempted; more intrigue and action are carried on; our curiosity is more awakened, and more interesting situations arise. This variety is, upon the whole, an improvement on Tragedy; it renders the entertainment both more animated and more instructive; and when kept within due bounds, may be perfectly consistent with unity of subject. But the Poet must, at the same time, beware of not deviating too far from simplicity in the construction of his Fable. For if he overcharges it with action and intrigue, it becomes perplexed and embarrassed; and, by consequence, loses much of its effect. Congreve's "Mourning Bride," a Tragedy otherwise far from being void of merit, fails in this respect; and may be given as an instance of one standing in perfect opposition to the simplicity of the ancient Plots. The incidents succeed one another too rapidly. The play is too full of business. It is difficult for the mind to follow and comprehend the whole series of events; and, what is the greatest fault of all, the catastrophe, which ought always to be plain and simple, is brought about in a manner too artificial and intricate.

Unity of Action must not only be studied in the general construction of the Fable, or Plot, but must regulate the several acts and scenes, into which the Play is divided.

The division of every Play, into five acts, has no other foundation than common practice, and the authority of Horace:

Neve minor, neu sit quinto productior actu

Fabula. ——— *

DE ARTE POET.

* If you would have your Play deserve success,
Give it Five Acts complete, nor more, nor less.

FRANCIS.

It is a division purely arbitrary. There is nothing in the nature of the Composition which fixes this number rather than any other; and it had been much better if no such number had been ascertained, but every play had been allowed to divide itself into as many parts, or intervals, as the subject naturally pointed out. On the Greek Stage, whatever may have been the case on the Roman, the division by Acts was totally unknown. The word, Act, never, once occurs in Aristotle's Poetics, in which he defines exactly every part of the Drama, and divides it into the beginning, the middle, and the end; or in his own words, into the Prologue, the Episode, and the Exode. The Greek Tragedy was, indeed, one continued representation, from beginning to end. The Stage was never empty, nor the curtain let fall. But at certain intervals, when the Actors retired, the Chorus continued and sung. Neither do these Songs of the Chorus divide the Greek Tragedies into five portions, similar to our Acts; though some of the Commentators have endeavoured to force them into this office. But it is plain, that the intervals at which the Chorus sung, are extremely unequal and irregular; suited to the occasion and the subject; and would divide the Play sometimes into three, sometimes into seven or eight Acts.*

As practice has now established a different plan on the Modern Stage, has divided every Play into Five Acts, and made a total pause in the representation at the end of each Act, the Poet must be careful that this pause shall fall in a proper place; where there is a natural pause in the Action, and where, if the imagination has any thing to supply, that is not represented on the Stage, it may be supposed to have been transacted during the interval.

* See the dissertation prefixed to Franklin's Translation of Sophocles.

The first Act ought to contain a clear exposition of the subject. It ought to be so managed as to awaken the curiosity of the Spectators; and at the same time to furnish them with materials for understanding the sequel. It should make them acquainted with the personages who are to appear, with their several views and interests, and with the situation of affairs at the time when the Play commences. A striking Introduction, such as the first speech of Almeria, in the Mourning Bride, and that of Lady Randolph, in Douglas, produces a happy effect: but this is what the subject will not always admit. In the ruder times of Dramatic Writing, the exposition of the subject was wont to be made by a Prologue, or by a single Actor appearing, and giving full and direct information to the Spectators. Some of Æschylus's and Euripides's Plays are opened in this manner. But such an introduction is extremely inartificial, and therefore is now totally abolished, and the subject made to open itself by conversation, among the first Actors who are brought upon the Stage.

During the course of the Drama, in the Second, Third, and Fourth Acts, the Plot should gradually thicken. The great object which the Poet ought here to have in view, is, by interesting us in his story, to keep our passions always awake. As soon as he allows us to languish, there is no more tragic merit. He should, therefore, introduce no personages but such as are necessary for carrying on the action. He should contrive to place those whom he finds it proper to introduce, in the most interesting situations. He should have no scenes of idle conversation or mere declamation. The Action of the Play ought to be always advancing, and as it advances, the suspense, and the concern of the Spectators, to be raised more and more. This is the great excellency of Shakespeare, that his scenes are full of Sentiment and Action, never of mere discourse; whereas, it is often a fault of the best French Tragedians, that they allow the Action to languish for the sake of a long and artful Dialogue. Sentiment, Passion, Pity, and Terror, should reign throughout a Tragedy. Every thing should be full of movements. An useless incident, or an unnecessary conversation, weakens the interest which we take in the Action, and renders us cold and inattentive.

The fifth Act is the seat of the Catastrophe, or the unravelling of the Plot, in which we always expect the art and genius of the Poet to be most fully displayed. The first rule concerning it, is, that it be brought about by probable and natural means. Hence all unravellings which turn upon disguised habits, rencontres by night, mistakes of one person for another, and other such Theatrical and Romantic circumstances, are to be condemned as faulty. In the next place, the Catastrophe ought always to be simple; to depend on few events, and to include but few persons. Passion never rises so high when it is divided among many objects, as when it is directed towards one or a few. And it is still more checked, if the incidents be so complex and intricate, that the understanding is put on the stretch to trace them, when the heart should be wholly delivered up to emotion. The Catastrophe of the Mourning Bride, as I formerly hinted, offends against both these rules. In the last place, the Catastrophe of a Tragedy ought to be the reign of pure sentiment and passion. In proportion as it approaches, every thing should warm and glow. No long discourses; no cold reasonings; no parade of genius, in the midst of those solemn and awful events, that close some of the great revolutions of human fortune. There, if any where, the Poet must be simple, serious, pathetic; and speak no language but that of nature.

The Ancients were fond of unravellings, which turned upon what is called, an "Anagnorisis," or a discovery of some person to be different from what he was taken to be. When such discoveries are artfully conducted, and produced in critical situations, they are extremely striking. Such as that famous one in Sophocles, which makes the whole subject of his Cædipus Tyrannus, and which is, undoubtedly, the fullest of suspense, agitation, and terror, that ever was exhibited on any Stage. Among the Moderns, two of the most distinguished Anagnorises, are those contained in Voltaire's Merope, and Mr. Home's Douglas: both of which are great master-pieces of the kind.

It is not essential to the catastrophe of a Tragedy, that it should end unhappily. In the course of the Play there may be sufficient agitation and distress, and many tender emotions raised by the sufferings and dangers of the virtuous, though, in the end, good men are rendered successful. The Tragic spirit, therefore, does not want scope upon this system; and accordingly, the Athalie of Racine, and some of Voltaire's finest Plays, such as Alzire, Merope, and the Orphan of China, with some few English Tragedies, likewise, have a fortunate conclusion. But, in general, the spirit of Tragedy, especially of English Tragedy, leans more to the side of leaving the impression of virtuous sorrow full and strong upon the heart.

A question, intimately connected with this subject, and which has employed the speculations of several philosophical Critics, naturally occurs here: How it comes to pass that those emotions of sorrow which Tragedy excites, afford any gratification to the mind? For, is not sorrow, in its nature, a painful passion? Is not real distress often occasioned to the Spectators, by the Dramatic Representations at which they assist? Do we not see their tears flow? and yet, while the impression of what they have suffered remains upon their minds, they again assemble in crowds, to renew the same distresses. The question is not without difficulty, and various solutions of it have been proposed by ingenious men.* The most plain and satisfactory account of the matter, appears to me to be the following. By the wise and gracious constitution of our nature, the exercise of all the social passions is attended with pleasure. Nothing is more pleasing and grateful, than love and friendship. Wherever man takes a strong interest in the concerns of his fellow creatures, an internal satisfac-

* See Dr. Campbell's Philosophy of Rhetoric, Book I. ch. xi. where an account is given of the hypotheses of different Critics on this subject; and where one is proposed, with which, in the main, I agree. — See also Lord Kaim's Essays on the Principles of Morality, Essay I. And Mr. David Hume's Essay on Tragedy.

tion is made to accompany the feeling. Pity, or compassion, in particular, is, for wise ends, appointed to be one of the strongest instincts of our frame, and is attended with a peculiar attractive power. It is an affection which cannot but be productive of some distress, on account of the sympathy with the sufferers, which it necessarily involves. But, as it includes benevolence and friendship, it partakes, at the same time of the agreeable and pleasing nature of those affections. The heart is warmed by kindness and humanity, at the same moment at which it is afflicted by the distresses of those with whom it sympathises and the pleasure arising from those kind emotions, prevails so much in the mixture, and so far counterbalances the pain, as to render the state of the mind, upon the whole, agreeable. At the same time, the immediate pleasure, which always goes along with the operation of the benevolent and sympathetic affections, derives an addition from the approbation of our own minds. We are pleased with ourselves for feeling as we ought, and for entering, with proper sorrow, into the concerns of the afflicted. In Tragedy, besides, other adventitious circumstances concur to diminish the painful part of Sympathy, and to increase the satisfaction attending it. We are, in some measure, relieved, by thinking that the cause of our distress is feigned, not real; and we are also, gratified by the charms of Poetry, the propriety of Sentiment and Language, and the beauty of Action. From the concurrence of these causes, the pleasure which we receive from Tragedy, notwithstanding the distress it occasions, seems to me to be accounted for in a satisfactory manner. At the same time, it is to be observed, that, as there is always a mixture of pain in the pleasure, that pain is capable of being so much heightened, by the representation of incidents extremely direful, as to shock our feelings, and to render us averse, either to the reading of such Tragedies, or to the beholding of them upon the Stage.

Having now spoken of the conduct of the subject throughout the Acts, it is also necessary to take notice of the conduct of the several Scenes which make up the Acts of a Play.

The entrance of a new personage upon the Stage, forms, what is called a New Scene. These Scenes, or successive conversations, should be closely linked and connected with each other; and much of the Art of Dramatic Composition is shown in maintaining this connection. Two rules are necessary to be observed for this purpose.

The first is, that, during the course of one Act, the Stage should never be left vacant, though but for a single moment; that is, all the persons who have appeared in one Scene, or conversation, should never go off together, and be succeeded by a new set of persons appearing in the next Scene, independent of the former. This makes a gap, or total interruption in the representation, which, in effect, puts an end to that Act. For whenever the Stage is evacuated, the Act is closed. This rule is, very generally, observed by the French Tragedians; but the English Writers, both of Comedy and Tragedy, seldom pay any regard to it. Their personages succeed one another upon the Stage with so little connection; the union of their Scenes is so much broken, that, with equal propriety, their Plays might be divided into ten or twelve Acts as into five.

The second rule which the English writers also observe little better than the former, is, that no person shall come upon the Stage, or leave it, without a reason appearing to us, both for the one and the other. Nothing is more awkward, and contrary to art, than for an Actor to enter, without our seeing any cause for his appearing in that Scene, except that it was for the Poet's purpose he should enter precisely at such a moment; or for an Actor to go away without any reason for his retiring; farther than that the Poet had no more speeches to put into his mouth. This is managing the Personæ Dramatis exactly like so many puppets, who are moved by wires, to answer the call of the master of the show. Whereas the perfection of Dramatic Writing requires that every thing should be conducted in imitation, as near as possible, of some real transaction; where we are let into the secret of all that is passing; where we behold persons before us always busy; see them coming and going; and know perfectly whence they come and whither they go, and about what they are employed.

All that I have hitherto said, relates to the Unity of the Dramatic Action. In order to render the Unity of Action more complete, Critics have added the other two Unities of Time and Place. The strict observance of these is more difficult, and, perhaps, not so necessary. The Unity of Place requires, that the Scene should never be shifted; but that the Action of the play should be continued to the end, in the same place where it is supposed to begin. The Unity of Time, strictly taken, requires, that the time of the Action be no longer than the time that is allowed for the Representation of the Play; though Aristotle seems to have given the Poet a little more liberty, and permitted the action to comprehend the whole time of one day.

The intention of both these rules is, to overcharge, as little as possible, the imagination of the Spectators with improbable circumstances in the acting of the Play, and to bring the imitation more close to reality. We must observe, that the nature of Dramatic Exhibitions upon the Greek Stage, subjected the Ancient Tragedians to a more strict Observance of these Unities than is necessary in Modern Theatres. I shewed, that a Greek Tragedy was one uninterrupted representation, from beginning to end. There was no division of Acts; no pauses or interval between them; but the Stage was continually full; occupied either by the Actors, or the Chorus. Hence, no room was left for the imagination to go beyond the precise time and place of the representation; any more than is allowed during the continuance of one Act, on the Modern Theatre.

But the practice of suspending the spectacle totally for some little time between the Acts, has made a great and material change; gives more latitude to the imagination, and renders the ancient strict confinement to time and place less necessary. While the acting of the Play is interrupted, the Spectator can, without any great or violent effort, suppose a few hours to pass between every act; or can suppose himself moved from one apartment of a palace, or one part of a city to another: and, therefore, too strict an observance of these Unities ought not to be preferred to higher beauties of execution, nor to the introduction of more pathetic situations, which sometimes cannot be accomplished in any other way, than by the transgression of these rules.

On the Ancient Stage, we plainly see the Poets struggling with many an inconvenience, in order to preserve those Unities which were then so necessary. As the Scene could never be shifted, they were obliged to make it always lie in some court of a palace, or some public area, to which all the persons concerned in the action might have equal access. This led to frequent improbabilities, by representing things as transacted there, which naturally ought to have been transacted before few witnesses, and in private apartments. The like improbabilities arose, from limiting themselves so much in point of time. Incidents were unnaturally crowded; and it is easy to point out several instances in the Greek Tragedies, where events are supposed to pass during a Song of the Chorus, which must necessarily have employed many hours.

But though it seems necessary to set Modern Poets free from a strict observance of these Dramatic Unities, yet we must remember there are certain bounds to this liberty. Frequent and wild changes of time and place; hurrying the Spectator from one distant city, or country to another; or making several days or weeks to pass during the course of the Representation, are liberties which shock the imagination, which give to the performance a romantic and unnatural appearance, and, therefore, cannot be allowed in any Dramatic Writer, who aspires to correctness. In particular, we must remember, that it is only between the Acts, that any liberty can be given for going beyond the Unities of Time and Place. During the course of each Act, they ought to be strictly observed; that is, during each Act the Scene should continue the same, and no more time should be supposed to pass, than is employed in the representation of that act. This is a rule which the French Tragedians regularly observe. To violate this rule, as is too often done by the English; to change the Place, and shift the Scene, in the midst of one Act, shews great incorrectness, and destroys the whole intention of the division of a Play into Acts. Mr. Addison's Cato is remarkable, beyond most English Tragedies; for regularity of conduct. The Author has limited himself, in time, to a single day: and in place, has maintained the most rigorous Unity. The Scene is never changed; and the whole action passes in the hall of Cato's house, at Utica,

In general, the nearer a Poet can bring the Dramatic Representation, in all its circumstances, to an imitation of nature and real life, the impression which he makes on us will always be the more perfect. Probability as I observed at the beginning of the lecture, is highly essential to the conduct of the Tragic Action, and we are always hurt by the want of it. It is this that makes the observance of the Dramatic Unities to be of consequence, as far as they can be observed, without sacrificing more material beauties. It is not, as has been sometimes said, that by the preservation of the Unities of Time and Place, Spectators are deceived into a belief of the reality of the objects which are set before them on the Stage; and that, when those Unities are violated, the charm is broken, and they discover the whole to be a fiction. No such deception as this can ever be accomplished. No one ever imagines himself to be at Athens, or Rome, when a Greek or Roman subject is presented on the Stage. He knows the whole to be an imitation only: but he requires that imitation to be conducted with skill and verisimilitude. His pleasure, the entertainment which he expects, the interest which he is to take in the Story, all depend on its being so conducted. His imagination, therefore, seeks to aid the imitation, and to rest on the probability; and the Poet, who shocks him by improbable circumstances, and by awkward, unskilful imitation, deprives him of his pleasure, and leaves him hurt and displeas'd. This is the whole mystery of the theatrical illusion.

LECTURE XLVI.

TRAGEDY. — GREEK — FRENCH — ENGLISH TRAGEDY.

HAVING treated of the Dramatic Action in Tragedy, I proceed next to treat of the Characters most proper to be exhibited. It has been thought, by several Critics, that the nature of Tragedy requires the principal personages to be always of illustrious character, and of high or princely rank; whose misfortunes and sufferings, it is said, take faster hold of the imagination, and impress the heart more forcibly than similar events, happening to persons in private life. But this is more specious than solid. It is refuted by facts. For the distresses of Desdemona, Monimia, and Belvidera, interest us as deeply as if they had been princesses or queens. The dignity of Tragedy does, indeed, require, that there should be nothing degrading or mean, in the circumstances of the persons which it exhibits; but it requires nothing more. Their high rank may render the spectacle more splendid, and the subject seemingly of more importance, but conduces very little to its being interesting or pathetic; which depends entirely on the nature of the Tale, on the art of the Poet in conducting it, and on the sentiments to which it gives occasion. In every rank of life, the relations of Father, Husband, Son, Brother, Lover, or Friend, lay the foundation of those affecting situations, which make man's heart feel for man.

The moral characters of the persons represented, are of much greater consequence than the external circumstances in which the Poet places them. Nothing, indeed, in the conduct of Tragedy, demands a Poet's attention more, than so to describe his personages, and so to order the incidents which relate to them, as shall leave upon the Spectators, impressions favourable to virtue, and to the administration of Providence. It is not necessary for this end, that poetical justice, as it is called, should be observed in the catastrophe of the Piece. This has been long exploded from Tragedy; the end of which is to affect us with pity for the virtuous in distress, and to afford a probable representation of the state of human life, where calamities often befall the best, and a mixed portion of good and evil is appointed for all. But withal, the Author must beware of shocking our minds with such representations of life as tend to raise horror, or to render virtue an object of aversion. Though innocent persons suffer, their sufferings ought to be attended with such circumstances, as shall make virtue appear amiable and venerable; and shall render their condition, on the whole, preferable to that of bad men, who have prevailed against them. The stings, and the remorse of guilt, must ever be represented as productive of greater miseries, than any that the bad can bring upon the good.

Aristotle's observations on the characters proper for Tragedy, are very judicious. He is of opinion, that perfect unmixed characters, either of good or ill men, are not the fittest to be introduced. The distresses of the one being wholly unmerited, hurt and shock us; and the sufferings of the other occasion no pity. Mixed characters, such as in fact we meet with in the world, afford the most proper field for displaying, without any bad effect on morals, the vicissitudes of life; and they interest us the more deeply, as they display emotions and passions which we have all been conscious of. When such persons fall into distress through the vices of others, the subject may be very pathetic; but it is always more instructive, when a person has been himself the cause of his misfortune, and when his misfortune is occasioned by the violence of passion, or by some weakness incident to human nature. Such subjects both dispose us to the deepest sympathy, and administer useful warnings to us for our own conduct.

Upon these principles, it surprises me that the story of Œdipus should have been so much celebrated by all the Critics, as one of the fittest subjects for Tragedy; and so often brought upon the Stage, not by Sophocles only, but by Corneille also, and Voltaire. An innocent person, one, in the main, of a virtuous character, through no crime of his own, nay, not by the vices of others, but through mere fatality and blind chance, is involved in the greatest of all human miseries. In a casual rencounter he kills his father, without knowing him; he afterwards is married to his own mother; and discovering himself in the end to have committed both parricide and incest, he becomes frantic, and dies in the utmost misery. Such a subject excites horror rather than pity. As it is conducted by Sophocles, it is indeed extremely affecting; but it conveys no instruction; it awakens in the mind no tender sympathy; it leaves no impression favourable to virtue or humanity.

It must be acknowledged, that the subjects of the ancient Greek Tragedies were too often founded on mere destiny and inevitable misfortunes. They were too much mixed with their tales about oracles, and the vengeance of the Gods, which led to many an incident sufficiently melancholy and tragical; but rather purely tragical than useful or moral. Hence, both the Œdipus's of Sophocles, the Iphigenia in Aulis, the Hecuba of Euripides, and several of the like kind. In the course of the Drama many moral sentiments occurred. But the instruction, which the Fable of the Play conveyed, seldom was any more, than that reverence was owing to the Gods, and submission due to the decrees of Destiny. Modern Tragedy has aimed at a higher object, by becoming more the theatre of passion; pointing out to men the consequences of their own misconduct; showing the direful effects which ambition, jealousy, love, resentment, and other such strong emotions, when misguided, or left unrestrained, produce upon human life. An Othello, hurried by jealousy to murder his innocent wife ; a Jaffier, ensnared by resentment and want, to engage in a conspiracy, and then stung with remorse, and involved in ruin ; a Siffredi, through the deceit which he employs for public spirited ends, bringing destruction on all whom he loved ; a Calista, seduced into a criminal intrigue, which overwhelms herself, her father, and all her friends in misery ; these, and such as these, are the examples which Tragedy now displays to public view ; and by means of which, it inculcates on men the proper government of their passions.

Of all the passions which furnish matter to Tragedy, that which has most occupied the Modern Stage is Love. To the Ancient Theatre, it was in a manner wholly unknown. In few of their Tragedies is it ever mentioned ; and I remember no more than one which turns upon it, the Hippolitus of Euripides. This was owing to the national manners of the Greeks, and to that greater separation of the two sexes from one another, than has taken place in modern times ; aided too, perhaps, by this circumstance, that no female actors ever appeared on the Ancient Stage. But though no reason appears for the total exclusion of Love from the Theatre, yet with what justice or propriety it has usurped so much place, as to be in a manner the sole hinge of Modern Tragedy, may be much questioned. Voltaire, who is no less eminent as a Critic than as a Poet, declares loudly and strongly against this predominancy of Love, as both degrading the majesty, and confining the natural limits of Tragedy. And assuredly, the mixing of it perpetually with all the great and solemn revolutions of human fortune which belong to the Tragic Stage, tends to give Tragedy too much the air of gallantry, and juvenile entertainment. The Athalie of Racine, the Meropé of Voltaire, the Douglas of Mr. Home, are sufficient proofs, that without any assistance from Love, the Drama is capable of producing its highest effects upon the mind.

This seems to be clear, that wherever Love is introduced into Tragedy, it ought to reign in it, and to give rise to the principal action. It ought to be that sort of Love which possesses all the force and majesty of passion; and which occasions great and important consequences. For nothing can have a worse effect, or be more debasing to Tragedy, than, together with the manly and heroic passions, to mingle a trifling love intrigue, as a sort of seasoning to the Play. The bad effects of this are sufficiently conspicuous both in the Cato of Mr. Addison, as I had occasion before to remark, and in the Iphigenie of Racine.

After a Tragic Poet has arranged his subject, and chosen his personages, the next thing he must attend to, is the propriety of sentiments; that they be perfectly suited to the characters of those persons to whom they are attributed, and to the situations in which they are placed. The necessity of observing this general rule is so obvious, that I need not insist upon it. It is principally in the pathetic parts, that both the difficulty and the importance of it are the greatest. Tragedy is the region of passion. We come to it, expecting to be moved; and let the Poet be ever so judicious in his conduct, moral in his intentions, and elegant in his Style, yet if he fails in the pathetic, he has no tragic merit, we return cold and disappointed from the performance, and never desire to meet with it more.

To paint passion so truly and justly as to strike the hearts of the hearers with full sympathy, is a prerogative of genius given to few. It requires strong and ardent sensibility of mind. It requires the Author to have the power of entering deeply into the characters which he draws; of becoming for a moment the very person whom he exhibits, and of assuming all his feelings. For, as I have often had occasion to observe, there is no possibility of speaking properly the language of any passion, without feeling it; and it is to the absence or deadness of real emotion, that we must ascribe the want of success in so many Tragic Writers, when they attempt being pathetic.

No man, for instance, when he is under the strong agitations of anger or grief, or any such violent passion, ever thinks of describing to another what his feelings at that time are; or of telling them what he resembles. This never was, and never will be, the language of any person, when he is deeply moved. It is the language of one who describes coolly the condition of that person to another; or it is the language of the passionate person himself, after his emotion has subsided, relating what his situation was in the moments of passion. Yet this sort of secondary description is what Tragic Poets too often give us, instead of the native and primary language of passion. Thus, in Mr. Addison's Cato, when Lucia confesses to Portius her love for him, but, at the same time, swears with the greatest solemnity, that in the present situation of their country she will never marry him, Portius receives this unexpected sentence with the utmost astonishment and grief; at least the Poet wants to make us believe that he so received it. How does he express these feelings?

Fix'd in astonishment, I gaze upon thee,
Like one just blasted by a stroke from Heav'n,
Who pants for breath, and stiffens yet alive
In dreadful looks, a monument of wrath.

This makes his whole reply to Lucia. Now did any person, who was of a sudden astonished and overwhelmed with sorrow, ever since the creation of the world, express himself in this manner? This is indeed an excellent description to be given us by another, of a person who was in such a situation. Nothing would have been more proper for a bye-stander, recounting this conference, than to have said,

Fix'd in astonishment, he gaz'd upon her,
Like one just blasted by a stroke from Heav'n,
Who pants for breath, &c.

But the person who is himself concerned, speaks, on such an occasion, in a very different manner. He gives vent to his feelings; he pleads for pity; he dwells upon the cause of his grief and astonishment; but never thinks of describing his own person and looks, and showing us, by a simile, what he resembles. Such representations of passions are no better in Poetry, than it would be in painting, to make a label issue from the mouth of a figure, bidding us remark, that this figure represents an astonished, or a grieved person.

On some other occasions, when Poets do not employ this sort of descriptive language in passion, they are too apt to run into forced and unnatural thoughts, in order to exaggerate the feelings of persons, whom they would paint as very strongly moved. When Osmyn, in the Mourning Bride, after parting with Almeria, regrets in a long soliloquy, that his eyes only see objects that are present, and cannot see Almeria after she is gone; when Jane Shore, in Mr. Rowe's Tragedy, on meeting with her husband in her extreme distress, and finding that he had forgiven her, calls on the rains to give her their drops, and the springs to give her their streams, that she may never want a supply of tears; in such passages, we see very plainly that it is neither Osmyn, nor Jane Shore, that speak; but the Poet himself in his own person, who, instead of assuming the feelings of those whom he means to exhibit, and speaking as they would have done in such situations, is straining his fancy, and spurring up his genius to say something that shall be uncommonly strong and lively.

If we attend to the language that is spoken by persons under the influence of real passion, we shall find it always plain and simple; abounding indeed with those figures which express a disturbed and impetuous state of mind, such as interrogations, exclamations, and apostrophes; but never employing those which belong to the mere embellishment and parade of Speech. We never meet with any subtilty or refinement, in the sentiments of real passion. The thoughts which passion suggests, are always plain and obvious ones, arising directly from its object. Passion never reasons, nor speculates, till its ardour begins to cool. It never leads to long discourse or declamation. On the contrary, it expresses itself most commonly in short, broken and interrupted Speeches; corresponding to the violent and desultory emotions of the mind.

When we examine the French Tragedians by these principles, which seem clearly founded in nature, we find them often deficient. Though in many parts of Tragic Composition, they have great merit; though in exciting soft and tender emotions, some of them are very successful; yet in the high and strong pathetic, they generally fail. Their passionate Speeches too often run into long declamation. There is too much reasoning and refinement; too much pomp and studied beauty in them. They rather convey a feeble impression of passion, than awaken any strong sympathy in the Reader's mind.

Sophocles and Euripides are much more successful in this part of Composition. In their pathetic scenes, we find no unnatural refinement; no exaggerated thoughts. They set before us the plain and direct feelings of nature, in simple expressive language; and therefore, on great occasions, they seldom fail of touching the heart.* This, too, is Shakespeare's great excellency; and to this it is principally owing, that his dramatic productions, notwithstanding their many imperfections, have been so long the favourites of the Public. He is more

* Nothing, for instance, can be more touching and pathetic than the address which Medea, in Euripides, makes to her children, when she had formed the resolution of putting them to death: and nothing more natural, than the conflict which she is described as suffering within herself on that occasion;

Φευ, Φευ* τι προσδερκισθε μ' ομμασιν τεκνω ;
 Τι προσγελατε τον πανυστατον γελων ;
 'Αι, αι* τι δρασω ; καρδια γαρ οιχεται*
 Γυναικες, ομμα φαιδρον ως ειδον τεκνων
 'Ουκ αν δυναιμην. χαιρετω βελευματα, &c.

faithful to the true language of nature, in the midst of passion, than any Writer. He gives us this language unadulterated by art; and more instances of it can be quoted from him than from all other Tragic Poets taken together. I shall refer only to that admirable scene in Macbeth, where Macduff receives the account of his wife and all his children being slaughtered in his absence. The emotions, first of grief, and then of the most fierce resentment rising against Macbeth, are painted in such a manner that there is no heart but must feel them, and no fancy can conceive any thing more expressive of Nature.

With regard to moral sentiments and reflections in Tragedies, it is clear that they must not recur too often. They lose their effect, when unseasonably crowded. They render the Play pedantic and declamatory. This is remarkably the case with those Latin Tragedies which go under the name of Seneca, which are little more than a collection of declamations and moral sentences, wrought up with a quaint brilliancy, which suited the prevailing taste of that age.

I am not, however, of opinion, that moral reflections ought to be altogether omitted in Tragedies. When properly introduced, they give dignity to the Composition, and, on many occasions, they are extremely natural. When Persons are under any uncommon distress, when they are beholding in others, or experiencing in themselves, the vicissitudes of human fortune; indeed, when they are placed in any of the great and trying situations of life, serious and moral reflections naturally occur to them, whether they be persons of much virtue or not. Almost every human being is, on such occasions, disposed to be serious. It is then the natural tone of the mind; and therefore no Tragic poet should omit such proper opportunities, when they occur, for favouring the interests of virtue. Cardinal Wolsey's soliloquy upon his fall, for instance, in Shakespeare, when he bids a long farewell to all his greatness, and the advices which he afterwards gives to Cromwell, are, in his situation, extremely natural; touch and please all Readers; and are at once instructive and affecting. Much of the merit of Mr. Addison's Cato depends upon that moral turn of thought which distinguishes it. I have had occasion, both in this Lecture and in the preceding one, to take notice of some of its defects; and certainly neither for warmth of passion nor proper conduct of the plot, is it at all eminent. It does not, however, follow, that it is destitute of merit. For, by the purity and beauty of the language, by the dignity of Cato's character, by that ardour of public spirit, and those virtuous sentiments of which it is full, it has always commanded high regard; and has, both in our own country and among foreigners, acquired no small reputation.

The Style and Versification of Tragedy ought to be free, easy, and varied. Our blank verse is happily suited to this purpose. It has sufficient majesty for raising the Style; it can descend to the simple and familiar; it is susceptible of great variety of cadence; and is quite free from the constraint and monotony of rhyme. For monotony is, above all things, to be avoided by a Tragic Poet. If he maintains every where the same stateliness of Style; if he uniformly keeps up the same run of measure and harmony in his Verse, he cannot fail of becoming insipid. He should not, indeed, sink into flat and careless lines ; his Style should always have force and dignity, but not the uniform dignity of Epic Poetry. It should assume that briskness and ease which is suited to the freedom of dialogue, and the fluctuations of passion.

One of the greatest misfortunes of the French Tragedy is, its being always written in rhyme. The nature of the French language, indeed, requires this, in order to distinguish the Style from mere Prose. But it fetters the freedom of the Tragic Dialogue, fills it with a languid monotony, and is, in a manner, fatal to the high strength and power of passion. Voltaire maintains, that the difficulty of composing in French Rhyme, is one great cause of the pleasure which the Audience receives from the Composition. Tragedy would be ruined, says he, if we were to write it in Blank Verse ; take away the difficulty, and you take away the whole merit. A strange idea ! as if the entertainment of the Audience arose, not from the emotions which the Poet is successful in awakening, but from a reflection on the toil which he endured in his closet, from assorting male and female Rhymes. With regard to those splendid comparisons in Rhyme, and strings of couplets, with which it was, some time ago, fashionable for our English Poets to conclude, not only every act of a Tragedy, but sometimes also the most interesting Scenes, nothing need be said, but that they were the most perfect barbarisms ; childish ornaments, introduced to please a false taste in the Audience ; and now universally laid aside.

Having thus treated of all the different parts of Tragedy, I shall conclude the subject, with a short view of the Greek, the French, and the English Stage, and with observations on the principal Writers.

Most of the distinguishing characters of the Greek Tragedy have been already occasionally mentioned. It was embellished with the Lyric Poetry of the Chorus, of the origin of which, and of the advantages and disadvantages attending it, I treated fully in the preceding Lecture. The plot was always exceedingly simple. It admitted of few incidents. It was conducted with a very exact regard to the unities of action, time, and place. Machinery, or the intervention of the Gods, was employed; and, which is very faulty, the final unravelling sometimes made to turn upon it. Love, except in one or two instances, was never admitted into the Greek Tragedy. Their subjects were often founded on destiny, or inevitable misfortunes. A vein of religious and moral sentiment always runs through them; but they made less use than the Moderns of the combat of the passions, and of the distresses which our passions bring upon us. Their plots were all taken from the ancient traditionary stories of their own nations. Hercules furnishes matter for two Tragedies. The history of Œdipus, King of Thebes, and his unfortunate family, for six. The war of Troy, with its consequences, for no fewer than seventeen. There is only one of later date than this; which is the Persæ, or expedition of Xerxes, by Æschylus.

Æschylus is the Father of the Greek Tragedy, and exhibits both the beauties, and the defects, of an early original Writer. He is bold, nervous, and animated; but very obscure and difficult to be understood; partly by reason of the incorrect state in which we have his works (they having suffered more by time, than any of the Ancient Tragedians), and partly on account of the nature of his Style, which is crowded with metaphors, often harsh and tumid. He abounds with martial ideas and descriptions. He has much fire and elevation; less of tenderness, than of force. He delights in the marvellous. The Ghost of Darius in the Persæ, the inspiration of Cassandra in Agamemnon, and the Songs of the Furies in the Eumenides, are beautiful in their kind, and strongly expressive of his genius.

Sophocles is the most masterly of the three Greek Tragedians; the most correct in the conduct of his subjects; the most just and sublime in his sentiments. He is eminent for his descriptive talent. The relation of the death of Œdipus, in his Œdipus Coloneus, and of the death of Hæmon and Antigone, in his Antigone, are perfect patterns of description to Tragic Poets. Euripides is esteemed more tender than Sophocles; and he is fuller of moral sentiments. But, in the conduct of his plays, he is more incorrect and negligent; his expositions, or openings of the subject, are made in a less artful manner; and the Songs of his Chorus, though remarkably poetical, have, commonly, less connection with the main action, than those of Sophocles. Both Euripides and Sophocles, however, have very high merit as Tragic Poets. They are elegant and beautiful in their Style; just, for the most part, in their thoughts; they speak with the voice of nature; and, making allowance for the difference of ancient and modern ideas, in the midst of all their simplicity, they are touching and interesting.

The circumstances of theatrical representation on the stages of Greece and Rome, were, in several respects, very singular, and widely different from what obtains among us. Not only were the Songs of the Chorus accompanied with instrumental music, but as the Abbé de Bos, in his Reflections on Poetry and Painting, has proved, with much curious erudition, the dialogue part had also a modulation of its own, which was capable of being set to notes; it was carried on in a sort of recitative between the actors, and was supported by instruments. He has farther attempted to prove, but the proof seems more incomplete, that on some occasions, on the Roman stage, the pronouncing and gesticulating parts were divided; that one actor spoke, and another performed the gestures and motions corresponding to what the first said. The actors in Tragedy wore a long robe, called Syrma, which flowed upon the Stage. They were raised upon Cothurni, which rendered their stature uncommonly high; and they always played in masques. These masques were like helmets, which covered the whole head; the mouths of them were so contrived as to give an artificial sound to the voice, in order to make it be heard over their vast theatres; and the visage was so formed and painted, as to suit the age, characters, or dispositions of the persons represented. When, during the course of one Scene, different emotions were to appear in the same person, the masque is said to have been so painted, that the Actor, by turning one or other profile of his face to the Spectators, expressed the change of the situation. This, however, was a contrivance attended with many disadvantages. The masque must have deprived the spectators of all the pleasure which arises from the natural animated expression of the eye, and the countenance; and, joined with the other circumstances which I have mentioned, is apt to give us but an unfavourable idea of the dramatic representations of the Ancients. In defence of them it must, at the same time, be remembered, that their theatres were vastly more extensive in the area than ours, and filled with immense crowds. They were always uncovered, and exposed to the open air. The actors were beheld at a much greater distance, and of course much more imperfectly by the bulk of the Spectators, which both rendered their looks of less consequence, and might make it in some degree necessary that their features should be exaggerated, the sound of their voices enlarged, and their whole appearance magnified beyond the life, in order to make the stronger impression. It is certain, that, as dramatic Spectacles were the favourite entertainments of the Greeks and Romans, the attention given to their proper exhibition, and the magnificènce of the apparatus bestowed on their theatres, far exceeded any thing that has been attempted in modern ages.

In the Compositions of some of the French Dramatic Writers, particularly Corneille, Racine, and Voltaire, Tragedy has appeared with much lustre and dignity. They must be allowed to have improved upon the Ancients, in introducing more incidents, a greater variety of passions, a fuller display of characters, and in rendering the subject thereby more interesting. They have studied to imitate the ancient models in regularity of conduct. They are attentive to all the unities, and to all the decorums of sentiment and morality; and their Style is, generally, very poetical and elegant. What an English taste is most apt to censure, in them, is the want of fervour, strength, and the natural language of passion. There is often too much conversation in their pieces, instead of action. They are too declamatory, as was before observed, when they should be passionate; too refined, when they should be simple. Voltaire freely acknowledges these defects of the French Theatre. He admits, that their best Tragedies do not make a sufficient impression on the heart; that the gallantry which reigns in them, and the long fine-spun dialogue with which they over-abound, frequently spread a languor over them; that the Authors seemed to be afraid of being too tragic; and very candidly gives it as his judgment, that an union of the vehemence and the action, which characterise the English Theatre, with the correctness and decorum of the French Theatre, would be necessary to form a perfect Tragedy.

Corneille, who is properly the Father of French Tragedy, is distinguished by the majesty and grandeur of his sentiments, and the fruitfulness of his imagination. His genius was unquestionably very rich, but seemed more turned towards the Epic than the Tragic vein; for, in general, he is magnificent and splendid, rather than tender and touching. He is the most declamatory of all the French Tragedians. He united the copiousness of Dryden with the fire of Lucan, and he resembles them also in their faults; in their extravagance and impetuosity. He has composed a great number of Tragedies, very unequal in their merit. His best and most esteemed pieces, are the Cid, Horace, Polyeucte, and Cinna.

Racine, as a Tragic Poet, is much superior to Corneille. He wanted the copiousness and grandeur of Corneille's imagination; but is free from his bombast, and excels him greatly in tenderness. Few Poets, indeed, are more tender and moving than Racine. His Phædra, his Andromaque, his Athalie, and his Mithridate, are excellent dramatic performances, and do no small honour to the French Stage. His language and versification are uncommonly beautiful. Of all the French Authors, he appears to me to have most excelled in Poetical Style; to have managed their Rhyme with the greatest advantage and facility, and to have given it the most complete harmony. Voltaire has, again and again, pronounced Racine's Athalie to be the "Chef d'Oeuvre" of the French Stage. It is altogether a sacred drama, and owes much of its elevation to the Majesty of Religion; but it is less tender and interesting than Andromaque. Racine has formed two of his plays upon plans of Euripides. In the Phædra he is extremely successful, but not so, in my opinion, in the Iphigenie; where he has degraded the ancient characters, by unseasonable gallantry. Achilles is a French lover; and Eriphile, a modern Lady.*

* The characters of Corneille and Racine are happily contrasted with each other, in the following beautiful lines of a French Poet, which will gratify several readers :

CORNEILLE.

Illum nobilibus majestas evehit alis
 Vertice tangentem nubis : stant ordine longo
 Magnanimi circum heroës, fulgentibus omnes
 Induti trabeis ; Polyeuctus, Cinna, Seleucus,
 Et Cidus, et rugis signatus Horatius ora.

RACINE.

Hunc circumvolitat penna alludente Cupido,
 Vincla triumphatis insternens florea scenis :
 Colligit hæc mollis genius, levibusque catenis

Voltaire, in several of his Tragedies, is inferior to none of his predecessors. In one great article, he has outdone them all, in the delicate and interesting situations which he has contrived to introduce. In these lies his chief strength. He is not, indeed, exempt from the defects of the other French Tragedians, of wanting force, and of being sometimes too long and declamatory in his speeches; but his characters are

Heröas stringit dociles, Pyrrhosque, TITOSQUE,
 Pelidasque ac Hippolytos, qui sponte sequuntur
 Servitium, facilesque ferunt in vincula palmas.
 Ingentes nimirum animos Cornelius ingens,
 Et quales habet ipse, suis heröibus afflat
 Sublimes sensus; vox olli mascula, magnum os,
 Nec mortale sonans. Rapido fluit impete vena,
 Vena Sophocleis non inficianda fluentis.
 Racinius Gallis haud visos ante theatri
 Mollior ingenio teneros induxit amores.
 Magnanimos quamvis sensus sub pectore verset
 Agrippina, licet Romano robore Burrhus
 Polleat, et magni generosa superbia Pori
 Non semel eniteat, tamen esse ad mollia natum
 Credideris vatem; vox olli mellea, lenis
 Spiritus est; non ille animis vim concitus infert,
 At cæcos animorum aditus rimatur, et imis
 Mentibus occultos, syren penetrabilis, ictus
 Insinuans, palpando ferit, læditque placendo.
 Vena fluit facili non intermissa nitore,
 Nec rapidos semper volvit cum murmure fluctus.
 Agmine sed leni fluitat. Seu gramina lambit
 Rivulus, et cæco per prata virentia lapsu,
 Aufugiens, tacita fluit indeprentus arena;
 Flore micant ripæ illimes; huc vulgus amantum
 Convolat, et lacrymis auget rivalibus undas:
 Singultus undæ referunt, gemitusque sonoros
 Ingeminant, molli gemitus imitante susurro.

Templum Tragædiæ, per FR. MARSY.

è Societate Jesu.

drawn with spirit, his events are striking, and in his sentiments there is much elevation. His Zayre, Alzire, Meropé, and Orphan of China, are four capital Tragedies, and deserve the highest praise. What one might perhaps not expect, Voltaire is, in the strain of his sentiments, the most religious, and the most moral, of all Tragic Poets.

Though the musical Dramas of Metastasio fulfil not the character of just and regular Tragedies, they approach however so near to it, and possess so much merit, that it would be unjust to pass them over without notice. For the elegance of Style, the charms of Lyric Poetry, and the beauties of sentiment, they are eminent. They abound in well-contrived and interesting situations. The Dialogue, by its closeness and rapidity, carries a considerable resemblance to that of the Ancient Greek Tragedies; and is both more animated and more natural, than the long declamation of the French Theatre. But the shortness of the several Dramas, and the intermixture of so much Lyric Poetry as belongs to this sort of Composition, often occasions the course of the incidents to be hurried on too quickly, and prevents that consistent display of Characters, and that full preparation of events, which are necessary to give a proper verisimilitude to Tragedy.

It only now remains to speak of the state of Tragedy in Great Britain; the general character of which is, that it is more animated and passionate than French Tragedy, but more irregular and incorrect, and less attentive to decorum and to elegance. The pathetic, it must always be remembered, is the soul of Tragedy. The English, therefore, must be allowed to have aimed at the highest species of excellence; though, in the execution, they have not always joined the other beauties that ought to accompany the pathetic.

The first object which presents itself to us on the English Theatre, is the great Shakespeare. Great he may be justly called, as the extent and force of his natural genius, both for Tragedy and Comedy, are altogether unrivalled.* But, at the same time, it is genius shooting wild; deficient in just taste, and altogether unassisted by knowledge or art. Long has he been idolised by the British nation; much has been said, and much has been written concerning him; Criticism has been drawn to the very dregs, in commentaries upon his words and witticisms; and yet it remains to this day in doubt, whether his beauties, or his faults, be greatest. Admirable scenes, and passages, without number, there are in his Plays; passages beyond what are to be found in any other Dramatic Writer; but there is hardly any one of his Plays which can be called altogether a

* The character which Dryden has drawn of Shakespeare is not only just, but uncommonly elegant and happy. "He was the man, who, of all modern, and perhaps ancient Poets, had the largest and most comprehensive soul. All the images of Nature were still present to him, and he drew them not laboriously, but luckily. When he describes any thing, you more than see it; you feel it too. They who accuse him of wanting learning, give him the greatest commendation. He was naturally learned. He needed not the Spectacles of Books to read Nature. He looked inward, and found her there. I cannot say he is every where alike. Were he so, I should do him injury to compare him to the greatest of mankind. He is many times flat and insipid; his comic wit degenerating into clenches; his serious swelling into bombast. But he is always great, when some great occasion is presented to him."

good one, or which can be read with uninterrupted pleasure from beginning to end. Besides extreme irregularities in conduct, and grotesque mixtures of serious and comic in one piece, we are often interrupted by unnatural thoughts, harsh expressions, a certain obscure bombast, and a play upon words, which he is fond of pursuing; and these interruptions to our pleasure too frequently occur, on occasions when we would least wish to meet with them. All these faults, however, Shakespeare redeems by two of the greatest excellencies which any Tragic Poet can possess; his lively and diversified paintings of character; his strong and natural expressions of passion. These are his two chief virtues; on these his merit rests. Notwithstanding his many absurdities, all the while we are reading his Plays, we find ourselves in the midst of our fellows; we meet with men, vulgar perhaps in their manners, coarse or harsh in their sentiments, but still they are men; they speak with human voices, and are actuated by human passions; we are interested in what they say or do, because we feel that they are of the same nature with ourselves. It is therefore no matter of wonder, that from the more polished and regular, but more cold and artificial performances of other Poets, the Public should return with pleasure to such warm and genuine representations of human nature. Shakespeare possesses likewise the merit of having created, for himself, a sort of world of præternatural beings. His witches, ghosts, fairies, and spirits of all kinds, are described with such circumstances of awful and mysterious solemnity, and speak a language so peculiar to themselves, as strongly to affect the imagination. His two master-pieces, and in which, in my opinion, the strength of his genius chiefly appears; are Othello and Macbeth. With regard to his historical plays, they are properly speaking, neither Tragedies nor Comedies; but a peculiar species of Dramatic Entertainment, calculated to describe the manners of the times of which he treats, to exhibit the principal characters, and to fix our imagination on the most interesting events and revolutions of our own country.*

After the age of Shakespeare, we can produce in the English language several detached Tragedies of considerable merit. But we have not many Dramatic Writers, whose whole works are entitled either to particular criticism, or very high praise. In the Tragedies of Dryden and Lee, there is much fire, but mixed with much fustian and rant. Lee's "Theodosius, or the Force of Love," is the best of his pieces, and, in some of the scenes, does not want tenderness and warmth; though romantic in the plan, and extravagant in the sentiments. Otway was endowed with a high portion of the Tragic spirit; which appears to great advantage in his two principal Tragedies, "The Orphan," and "Venice Preserved." In these, he is perhaps too Tragic; the distresses being so deep as to tear and overwhelm the mind. He is a Writer, doubtless, of genius and strong passion; but, at the same time, exceedingly gross and indelicate. No Tragedies are less moral than those of Otway. There are no generous or noble sentiments in them; but a licentious spirit often discovers itself. He is the very opposite of the French decorum; and has contrived to introduce obscenity and indecent allusions, into the midst of deep Tragedy.

* See an excellent defence of Shakespeare's Historical Plays, and several just observations on his peculiar excellencies as a Tragic Poet, in Mrs. Montague's Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakespeare.

Rowe's Tragedies make a contrast to those of Otway. He is full of elevated and moral sentiments. The Poetry is often good, and the language always pure and elegant; but, in most of his Plays, he is too cold and uninteresting; and flowery rather than tragic. Two, however, he has produced, which deserve to be exempted from this censure, Jane Shore and the Fair Penitent; in both of which, there are so many tender and truly pathetic scenes, as to render them justly favourites of the Public.

Dr. Young's Revenge is a play which discovers genius and fire; but wants tenderness, and turns too much upon the shocking and direful passions. In Congreve's Mourning Bride, there are some fine situations, and much good Poetry. The two first Acts are admirable. The meeting of Almeria with her husband Osmyn, in the tomb of Anselmo, is one of the most solemn and striking situations to be found in any Tragedy. The defects in the catastrophe, I pointed out in the last Lecture. Mr. Thomson's Tragedies are too full of a stiff morality, which renders them dull and formal. Tancred and Sigismunda far excels the rest; and for the plot, the characters, and sentiments, justly deserves a place among the best English Tragedies. Of later pieces, and of living Authors, it is not my purpose to treat.

Upon the whole, reviewing the Tragic Compositions of different nations, the following conclusions arise. A Greek Tragedy is the relation of any dis-tressful or melancholy incident ; sometimes the effect of passion or crime, oftener of the decree of the Gods, simply exposed ; without much variety of parts or events, but naturally and beautifully set before us ; heightened by the Poetry of the Chorus. A French Tragedy is a series of artful and refined conversations, founded upon a variety of tragical and interesting situations ; carried on with little action and vehemence ; but with much poetical beauty, and high propriety and decorum. An English Tragedy is the combat of strong passions, set before us in all their violence ; producing deep disasters ; often irregularly conducted ; abounding in action ; and filling the Spectators with grief. The Ancient Tragedies were more natural and simple ; the Modern are more artful and complex. Among the French there is more correctness ; among the English, more fire. Andromaque and Zayre soften, Othello and Venice Preserved rend, the heart. It deserves remark, that three of the greatest master-pieces of the French Tragic Theatre, turn wholly upon religious subjects : the Athalie of Racine, the Polyeucte of Corneille, and the Zayre of Voltaire. The first is founded upon a historical passage of the Old Testament ; in the other two, the distress arises from the zeal and attachment of the principal personages to the Christian faith ; and in all the three, the Authors have, with much propriety, availed themselves of the Majesty which may be derived from religious ideas.

LECTURE XLVII.

COMEDY. — GREEK AND ROMAN — FRENCH — ENGLISH COMEDY.

COMEDY is sufficiently discriminated from Tragedy, by its general spirit and strain. While pity and terror, and the other strong passions, form the province of the latter, the chief, or rather sole instrument of the former, is ridicule. Comedy proposes for its object, neither the great sufferings, nor the great crimes of men; but their follies and slighter vices, those parts of their character, which raise in beholders a sense of impropriety, which expose them to be censured and laughed at by others, or which render them troublesome in civil society.

This general idea of comedy, as a satirical exhibition of the improprieties and follies of mankind, is an idea very moral and useful. There is nothing in the nature, or general plan of this kind of Composition, that renders it liable to censure. To polish the manners of men, to promote attention to the proper decorums of social behaviour, and, above all, to render vice ridiculous, is doing a real service to the world. Many vices might be more successfully exploded, by employing ridicule against them, than by serious attacks and arguments. At the same time, it must be confessed, that ridicule is an instrument of such a nature, that when managed by unskilful, or improper hands, there is hazard of its doing mischief, instead of good to society. For ridicule is far from being, as some have maintained it to be, a proper test of truth. On the contrary, it is apt to mislead, and seduce, by the colours which it throws upon its objects; and it is often more difficult to judge, whether these colours be natural and proper, than it is to distinguish between simple truth and error. Licentious Writers, therefore, of the Comic class, have too often had it in their power to cast a ridicule upon characters and objects which did not deserve it. But this is a fault, not owing to the nature of Comedy, but to the genius and turn of the Writers of it. In the hands of a loose, immoral Author, Comedy will mislead and corrupt; while, in those of a virtuous and well-intentioned one, it will be not only a gay and innocent, but a laudable and useful entertainment. French Comedy is an excellent school of manners; while English Comedy has been too often the school of vice.

The rules respecting the Dramatic Action, which I delivered in the first Lecture upon Tragedy, belong equally to Comedy; and hence, of course, our disquisitions concerning it are shortened. It is equally necessary to both these forms of Dramatic Composition, that there be a proper unity of action and subject, that the unities of time and place be, as much as possible, preserved; that is, that the time of the action be brought within reasonable bounds; and the place of the action never changed, at least, not during the course of each Act; that the several Scenes or successive conversations be properly linked together; that the Stage be never totally evacuated till the Act closes; and that the reason should appear to us, why the personages, who fill up the different Scenes, enter and go off the Stage, at the time when they are made to do so. The scope of all these rules, I shewed, was to bring the imitation as near as possible to probability; which is always necessary, in order to any imitation giving us pleasure. This reason requires, perhaps, a stricter observance of the Dramatic rules in Comedy, than in Tragedy. For the action of Comedy being more familiar to us than that of Tragedy, more like what we are accustomed to see in common life, we judge more easily of what is probable, and are more hurt by the want of it. The probable and the natural, both in the conduct of the story, and in the characters and sentiments of the persons who are introduced, are the great foundation, it must always be remembered, of the whole beauty of Comedy.

The subjects of Tragedy are not limited to any country or to any age. The Tragic Poet may lay his Scene in whatever region he pleases. He may form his subject upon the history, either of his own, or of a foreign country; and he may take it from any period that is agreeable to him, however remote in time. The reverse of this holds in Comedy, for a clear and obvious reason. In the great vices, great virtues, and high passions, men of all countries and ages resemble one another; and are therefore equally subjects for the Tragic Muse. But those decórums of behaviour, those lesser discriminations of character, which afford subject for Comedy, change with the differences of countries and times; and can never be so well understood by foreigners, as by natives. We weep for the heroes of Greece and Rome, as freely as we do for those of our own country: but we are touched with the ridicule of such manners and such characters only, as we see and know; and therefore the Scene and subject of Comedy should always be laid in our own country, and in our own times. The Comic Poet, who aims at correcting improprieties and follies of behaviour, should study "to catch the manners living as they rise." It is not his business to amuse us with a tale of the last age, or with a Spanish or a French intrigue; but to give us pictures taken from among ourselves; to satirize reigning and present vices; to exhibit to the age a faithful copy of itself, with its humours, its follies, and its extravagancies. It is only by laying his plan in this manner, that he can add weight and dignity to the entertainment which he gives us. Plautus, it is true, and Terence, did not follow this rule. They laid the scene of their Comedies in Greece, and adopted the Greek laws and customs. But it must be remembered, that Comedy was, in their age, but a new entertainment in Rome; and that then they contented themselves with imitating, often with translating merely, the Comedies of Menander, and other Greek Writers. In aftertimes, it is known that the Romans had the "Comœdia Togata," or what was founded on their own manners, as well as the "Comœdia Palliata," or what was taken from the Greeks.

Comedy may be divided into two kinds; Comedy of Character, and Comedy of Intrigue. In the latter, the plot, or the action of the Play, is made the principal object. In the former, the display of some peculiar character is chiefly aimed at; the action is contrived altogether with a view to this end; and is treated as subordinate to it. The French abound most in Comedies of Character. All Moliere's capital pieces are of this sort; his Avare, for instance, Misanthrope, Tartuffe; and such are Destouches's also, and those of the other chief French Comedians. The English abound more in Comedies of Intrigue. In the Plays of Congreve, and, in general, in all our Comedies, there is much more story, more bustle and action, than on the French Theatre.

In order to give this sort of Composition its proper advantage, these two kinds should be properly mixed together. Without some interesting and well-conducted story, mere conversation is apt to become insipid. There should be always as much intrigue, as to give us something to wish, and something to fear. The incidents should so succeed one another, as to produce striking situations, and to fix our attention; while they afford at the same time a proper field for the exhibition of character. For the Poet must never forget, that to exhibit characters and manners is his principal object. The action in Comedy, though it demands his care, in order to render it animated and natural, is a less significant and important part of the performance, than the action in Tragedy: as in Comedy, it is what men say, and how they behave, that draws our attention, rather than what they perform, or what they suffer. Hence it is a great fault to overcharge it with too much intrigue, and those intricate Spanish plots that were fashionable for a while, carried on by perplexed apartments, dark entries, and disguised habits, are now justly condemned and laid aside: for by such conduct, the main use of Comedy was lost. The attention of the Spectators, instead of being directed towards any display of characters, was fixed upon the surprising turns and revolutions of the intrigue; and Comedy was changed into a mere Novel.

In the management of Characters, one of the most common faults of Comic Writers, is the carrying of them too far beyond life. Wherever ridicule is concerned, it is indeed extremely difficult to hit the precise point where true wit ends, and buffoonery begins. When the Miser, for instance, in Plautus, searching the person whom he suspects for having stolen his casket, after examining first his right hand, and then his left, cries out, "ostende etiam tertiam," "shew me your third hand," (a stroke too which Moliere has copied from him,) there is no one but must be sensible of the extravagance. Certain degrees of exaggeration are allowed to the Comedian; but there are limits set to it by nature and good taste; and supposing the Miser to be ever so much engrossed by his jealousy and his suspicions, it is impossible to conceive any man in his wits suspecting another of having more than two hands.

Characters in Comedy ought to be clearly distinguished from one another; but the artificial contrasting of characters, and the introducing them always in pairs, and by opposites, give too theatrical and affected an air to the Piece. This is become too common a resource of Comic Writers, in order to heighten their characters, and display them to more advantage. As soon as the violent and impatient person arrives upon the Stage, the Spectator knows that, in the next scene, he is to be contrasted with the mild and good-natured man; or if one of the lovers introduced be remarkably gay and airy, we are sure that his companion is to be a grave and serious lover; like Frankly and Bellamy, Clarinda and Jacintha, in Dr. Hoadly's Suspicious Husband. Such production of Characters by pairs, is like the employment of the figure Antithesis in Discourse, which, as I formerly observed, gives brilliancy indeed upon occasions, but is too apparently a rhetorical artifice. In every sort of composition, the perfection of art is to conceal art. A masterly Writer will therefore give us his characters, distinguished rather by such shades of diversity as are commonly found in Society, than marked with such strong oppositions, as are rarely brought into actual contrast, in any of the circumstances of life.

The Style of Comedy ought to be pure, elegant, and lively, very seldom rising higher than the ordinary tone of polite conversation; and, upon no occasion, descending into vulgar, mean, and gross expressions. Here the French rhyme, which in many of their Comedies they have preserved, occurs as an unnatural bondage. Certainly, if Prose belongs to any Composition whatever, it is to that which imitates the conversation of men in ordinary life. One of the most difficult circumstances in writing Comedy, and one too, upon which the success of it very much depends, is to maintain, throughout, a current of easy, genteel, unaffected dialogue, without pertness and flippancy; without too much studied and unseasonable wit; without dullness and formality. Too few of our English Comedies are distinguished for this happy turn of conversation; most of them are liable to one or other of the exceptions I have mentioned. The Careless Husband, and, perhaps, we may add the Provoked Husband, and the Suspicious Husband, seem to have more merit than most of them, for easy and natural dialogue.

These are the chief observations that occur to me, concerning the general principles of this species of Dramatic Writing, as distinguished from Tragedy. But its nature and spirit will be still better understood, by a short history of its progress; and a view of the manner in which it has been carried on by Authors of different nations.

Tragedy is generally supposed to have been more ancient among the Greeks than Comedy. We have fewer lights concerning the origin and progress of the latter. What is most probable, is, that, like the other, it took its rise accidentally from the diversions peculiar to the feast of Bacchus, and from Thespis and his Cart; till, by degrees, it diverged into an entertainment of a quite different nature from solemn and heroic Tragedy. Critics distinguish three stages of Comedy among the Greeks; which they call the Ancient, the Middle, and the New.

The Ancient Comedy consisted in direct and avowed satire against particular known persons; who were brought upon the Stage by name. Of this nature are the Plays of Aristophanes, eleven of which are still extant; Plays of a very singular nature, and wholly different from all Compositions which have, since that age, borne the name of Comedy. They shew what a turbulent and licentious Republic that of Athens was, and what unrestrained scope the Athenians gave to ridicule, when they could suffer the most illustrious personages of their state, their generals, and their magistrates, Cleon, Lamachus, Nicias, Alcibiades, not to mention Socrates the Philosopher, and Euripides the Poet, to be publicly made the subject of Comedy. Several of Aristophanes's Plays are wholly political satires upon public management, and the conduct of generals and statesmen, during the Peloponnesian war. They are so full of political allegories and allusions, that it is impossible to understand them without a considerable knowledge of the history of those times. They abound too with Parodies of the great Tragic Poets, particularly of Euripides; to whom the Author bore much enmity, and has written two Comedies, almost wholly in order to ridicule him.

Vivacity, Satire, and Buffoonery, are the characteristics of Aristophanes. Genius and force he displays upon many occasions; but his performances, upon the whole, are not calculated to give us any high opinion of the Attic taste of wit in his age. They seem, indeed, to have been composed for the mob. The ridicule employed in them is extravagant; the wit, for the most part, buffoonish and farcical; the personal raillery, biting and cruel; and the obscenity that reigns in them is gross and intolerable. The treatment given by this Comedian, to Socrates the Philosopher, in his Play of "The Clouds," is well known; but however it might tend to disparage Socrates in the public esteem, P. Brumoy, in his Theatre Grec, makes it appear, that it could not have been, as is commonly supposed, the cause of decreeing the death of that Philosopher, which did not happen till twenty-three years after the representation of Aristophanes's Clouds. There is a Chorus in Aristophanes's Plays; but altogether of an irregular kind. It is partly serious, partly comic; sometimes mingles in the Action, sometimes addresses the Spectators, defends the Author, and attacks his enemies.

Soon after the days of Aristophanes, the liberty of attacking persons on the Stage by name, being found of dangerous consequence to the public peace, was prohibited by law. The Chorus also was, at this period, banished from the Comic Theatre, as having been an instrument of too much licence and abuse. Then, what is called the Middle Comedy took rise, which was no other than an elusion of the law. Fictitious names, indeed, were employed; but living persons were still attacked, and described in such a manner as to be sufficiently known. Of these Comic Pieces we have no remains. To them succeeded the New Comedy; when the Stage being obliged to desist wholly from personal ridicule, became, what it is now, the picture of manners and characters, but not of particular persons. Menander was the most distinguished Author of this kind among the Greeks; and both from the imitations of him by Terence, and the account given of him by Plutarch, we have much reason to regret that his writings have perished; as he appears to have reformed, in a very high degree, the public taste, and to have set the model of correct, elegant, and moral Comedy.

The only remains which we now have of the New Comedy, among the Ancients, are the Plays of Plautus and Terence; both of whom were formed upon the Greek Writers. Plautus is distinguished for very expressive language, and a great degree of the Vis Comica. As he wrote in an early period, he bears several marks of the rudeness of the Dramatic Art, among the Romans, in his time. He opens his Plays with Prologues, which sometimes pre-occupy the subject of the whole Piece. The representation too, and the action of the Comedy, are sometimes confounded; the Actor departing from his character, and addressing the Audience. There is too much low wit and scurrility in Plautus; too much of quaint conceit, and play upon words. But withal, he displays more variety, and more force than Terence. His characters are always strongly marked, though sometimes coarsely. His Amphytrion has been copied both by Moliere and by Dryden; and his Miser also (in the Aulularia), is the foundation of a capital Play of Moliere's, which has been once and again imitated on the English Stage. Than Terence, nothing can be more delicate, more polished, and elegant. His Style is a model of the purest and most graceful Latinity. His dialogue is always decent and correct; and he possesses, beyond most Writers, the art of relating with that beautiful picturesque simplicity, which never fails to please. His morality is, in general, unexceptionable. The situations which he introduces, are often tender and interesting; and many of his sentiments touch the heart. Hence, he may be considered as the founder of that serious Comedy, which has, of late years, been revived, and of which I shall have occasion afterwards to speak. If he fails in any thing, it is in sprightliness and strength. Both in his Characters, and in his Plots, there is too much sameness and uniformity throughout all his Plays; he copied Menander, and is said not to have equalled him.* In order to form a perfect Comic Author, an Union would be requisite

* Julius Cæsar has given us his opinion of Terence, in the following lines, which are preserved in the Life of Terence, ascribed to Suetonius :

..... Tu quoque, tu in summis, ô dimidiate Menander, Poneris, et merito, puri sermonis amator ;
 Lenibus atque utinam scriptis adjuncta foret vis
 Comica, ut æquato virtus polleret honore
 Cum Græcis, neque in hac despectus parte jaceres ;
 Unum hoc maceror, et doleo tibi deesse, Terenti.

of the spirit and fire of Plautus, with the grace and correctness of Terence.

When we enter on the view of Modern Comedy, one of the first objects which presents itself, is the Spanish Theatre, which has been remarkably fertile in Dramatic Productions. Lopez de Vega, Guillin, and Calderon, are the chief Spanish Comedians. Lopez de Vega, who is by much the most famous of them, is said to have written above a thousand Plays; but our surprise at the number of his productions will be diminished, by being informed of their nature. From the account which M. Perron de Castera, a French Writer, gives of them, it would seem, that our Shakespeare is perfectly a regular and methodical Author, in comparison of Lopez. He throws aside all regard to the Three Unities, or to any of the established forms of Dramatic Writing. One Play often includes many years, nay, the whole life of a man. The Scene, during the first Act, is laid in Spain, the next in Italy, and the third in Africa. His Plays are mostly of the historical kind, founded on the annals of the country; and they are, generally, a sort of Tragi-comedies; or a mixture of Heroic Speeches, Serious Incidents, War, and Slaughter, with much Ridicule and Buffoonery. Angels and Gods, Virtues and Vices, Christian Religion, and Pagan Mythology, are all frequently jumbled together. In short, they are Plays like no other Dramatic Compositions; full of the romantic and extravagant. At the same time, it is generally admitted, that in the Works of Lopez de Vega, there are frequent marks of genius, and much force of imagination; many well-drawn characters; many happy situations; many striking and interesting surprises; and, from the source of his rich invention, the Dramatic Writers of other countries are said to have frequently drawn their materials. He himself apologises for the extreme irregularity of his Composition, from the prevailing taste of his countrymen, who delighted in a variety of events, in strange and surprising adventures, and a labyrinth of intrigues, much more than in a natural and regularly conducted Story.

The general characters of the French Comic Theatre are, that it is correct, chaste, and decent. Several Writers of considerable note it has produced, such as Regnard, Dufresny, Dancourt, and Marivaux; but the Dramatic Author in whom the French glory most, and whom they justly place at the head of all their Comedians, is the famous Moliere. There is, indeed, no Author, in all the fruitful and distinguished age of Louis XIV. who has attained a higher reputation than Moliere; or, who has more nearly reached the summit of perfection in his own art, according to the judgment of all the French Critics. Voltaire boldly pronounces him to be the most eminent Comic Poet of any age or country: nor, perhaps, is this the decision of mere partiality; for taking him upon the whole, I know none who deserves to be preferred to him. Moliere is always the Satirist only of vice or folly. He has selected a great variety of ridiculous characters peculiar to the times in which he lived, and he has generally placed the ridicule justly. He possessed strong Comic powers; he is full of mirth and pleasantry; and his pleasantry is always innocent. His Comedies in Verse, such as the Misanthrope and Tartuffe, are a kind of dignified Comedy, in which vice is exposed, in the style of elegant and polite Satire. In his Prose Comedies, though there is abundance of ridicule, yet there is never any thing found to offend a modest ear, or to throw contempt on sobriety and virtue. Together with those high qualities, Moliere has also some defects, which Voltaire, though his professed Panegyrist, candidly admits. He is acknowledged not to be happy in the unravelling of his Plots. Attentive more to the strong exhibition of characters, than to the conduct of the intrigue, his unravelling is frequently brought on with too little preparation, and in an improbable manner. In his Verse Comedies, he is sometimes not sufficiently interesting, and too full of long speeches; and in his more risible Pieces in Prose, he is censured for being too farcical. Few Writers, however, if any, ever possessed the spirit, or attained the true end of Comedy, so perfectly, upon the whole, as Moliere. His Tartuffe, in the Style of Grave Comedy, and his Avare, in the Gay, are accounted his two capital productions.

From the English Theatre, we are naturally led to expect a greater variety of original characters in Comedy, and bolder strokes of wit and humour, than are to be found on any other Modern Stage. Humour is, in a great measure, the peculiar province of the English nation. The nature of such a free Government as ours; and that unrestrained liberty which our manners allow to every man, of living entirely after his own taste, afford full scope to the display of singularity of character, and to the indulgence of humour in all its forms. Whereas, in France, the influence of a despotic court, the more established subordination of ranks, and the universal observance of the forms of politeness and decorum, spread a much greater uniformity over the outward behaviour and characters of men. Hence Comedy has a more ample field, and can flow with a much freer vein in Britain, than in France. But it is extremely unfortunate, that, together with the freedom and boldness of the Comic spirit in Britain, there should have been joined such a spirit of indecency and licentiousness, as has disgraced English Comedy beyond that of any nation since the days of Aristophanes.

The first age, however, of English Comedy, was not infected by this spirit. Neither the Plays of Shakespeare, nor those of Ben Jonson, can be accused of immoral tendency. Shakespeare's general character, which I gave in the last Lecture, appears with as great advantage in his Comedies, as in his Tragedies; a strong, fertile, and creative genius, irregular in conduct, employed too often in amusing the mob, but singularly rich and happy in the description of characters and manners. Jonson is more regular in the conduct of his pieces, but stiff and pedantic; though not destitute of Dramatic Genius. In the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher, much fancy and invention appear, and several beautiful passages may be found. But, in general, they abound with romantic and improbable incidents, with overcharged and unnatural characters, and with coarse and gross allusions. These Comedies of the last age, by the change of public manners, and of the turn of conversation, since their time, are now become too obsolete to be very agreeable. For we must observe, that Comedy, depending much on the prevailing modes of external behaviour, becomes sooner antiquated than any other species of writing; and, when antiquated, it seems harsh to us, and loses its power of pleasing. This is especially the case with respect to the Comedies of our own country, where the change of manners is more sensible and striking than in any foreign production. In our own country, the present mode of behaviour is always the standard of politeness; and whatever departs from it appears uncouth; whereas in the Writings of foreigners, we are less acquainted with any standard of this kind, and of course are less hurt by the want of it. Plautus appeared more antiquated to the Romans, in the age of Augustus, than he does now to us. It is a high proof of Shakespeare's uncommon genius, that, notwithstanding these disadvantages, his character of Falstaff is to this day admired, and his "Merry Wives of Windsor" read with pleasure.

It was not till the æra of the Restoration of King Charles II. that the licentiousness which was observed, at that period, to infect the court, and the nation in general, seized, in a peculiar manner, upon Comedy as its province, and, for almost a whole century, retained possession of it. It was then first, that the Rake became the predominant character, and, with some exceptions, the Hero of every Comedy. The ridicule was thrown, not upon vice and folly, but much more commonly upon chastity and sobriety. At the end of the Play, indeed, the Rake is commonly, in appearance, reformed, and professes that he is to become a sober man; but throughout the Play, he is set up as the model of a fine gentleman; and the agreeable impression made by a sort of sprightly licentiousness, is left upon the imagination, as a picture of the pleasurable enjoyment of life; while the reformation passes slightly away, as a matter of mere form. To what sort of moral conduct such public entertainments as these tend to form the youth of both sexes, may be easily imagined. Yet this has been the spirit which has prevailed upon the Comic Stage of Great Britain, not only during the reign of Charles II. but throughout the reigns of King William and Queen Anne, and down to the days of King George II.

Dryden was the first considerable Dramatic Writer after the Restoration; in whose Comedies, as in all his works, there are found many strokes of genius, mixed with great carelessness, and visible marks of hasty composition. As he sought to please only, he went along with the manners of the times; and has carried through all his Comedies that vein of dissolute licentiousness, which was then fashionable. In some of them, the indecency was so gross as to occasion, even in that age, a prohibition of being brought upon the Stage. *

Since his time, the Writers of Comedy, of greatest note, have been Cibber, Vanburgh, Farquhar, and Congreve. Cibber has written a great many Comedies; and though, in several of them, there be much sprightliness, and a certain pert vivacity peculiar to him, yet they are so forced and unnatural in the incidents, as to have generally sunk into obscurity, except two, which have always continued in high

* “The mirth which he excites in Comedy, will, perhaps, be found not so much to arise from any original humour, or peculiarity of character, nicely distinguished, and diligently pursued, as from incidents and circumstances, artifices and surprises, from jests of action, rather than sentiment. What he had of humorous, or passionate, he seems to have had, not from nature, but from other Poets; if not always a plagiarist, yet, at least, an imitator.” JOHNSON’S Life of Dryden.

favour with the Public, "The Careless Husband," and "The Provoked Husband." The former is remarkable for the polite and easy turn of the Dialogue; and, with the exception of one indelicate Scene, is tolerably moral too in the conduct, and in the tendency. The latter, "The Provoked Husband," (which was the joint production of Vanburgh and Cibber,) is, perhaps, on the whole, the best Comedy in the English Language. It is liable, indeed, to one critical objection, of having a double Plot: as the Incidents of the Wronghead family, and those of Lord Townley's, are separate, and independent of each other. But this irregularity is compensated by the natural characters, the fine painting, and the happy strokes of humour with which it abounds. We are, indeed, surprised to find so unexceptionable a Comedy proceeding from two such loose Authors; for, in its general strain, it is calculated to expose licentiousness and folly; and would do honour to any Stage.

Sir John Vanburgh has spirit, wit, and ease; but he is to the last degree gross and indelicate. He is one of the most immoral of all our Comedians. His "Provoked Wife" is full of such indecent sentiments and allusions, as ought to explode it out of all reputable society. His "Relapse" is equally censurable; and these are his only two considerable Pieces. Congreve is, unquestionably, a Writer of genius. He is lively, witty, and sparkling; full of character, and full of action. His chief fault as a Comic Writer is, that he overflows with wit. It is often introduced unseasonably; and, almost every where, there is too great a proportion of it for natural well-bred conversation.* Farquhar is a light and gay Writer; less correct, and less sparkling than Congreve; but he has more ease, and, perhaps, fully as great a share of the Vis Comica. The two best, and least exceptionable of his Plays, are the "Recruiting Officer," and the "Beaux Stratagem." I say the least exceptionable; for, in general, the tendency of both Congreve and Farquhar's Plays is immoral. Throughout them all, the Rake, the loose intrigue, and the life of licentiousness, are the objects continually held up to view; as if the assemblies of a great and polished nation could be amused with none but vicious objects. The indelicacy of these Writers, in the female characters which they introduce, is particularly remarkable. Nothing can be more awkward than their representations of a woman of virtue and honour. Indeed, there are hardly any female characters in their Plays, except two; women of loose principles, or when a virtuous character is attempted to be drawn, women of affected manners.

The censure which I have now passed upon these celebrated Comedians, is far from being overstrained or severe. Accustomed to the indelicacy of our own Comedy, and amused with the wit and humour of it, its immorality too easily escapes our observation. But all foreigners, the French especially, who are accustomed to a better regulated and more

* Dr. Johnson says of him, in his Life, that "his personages are a kind of intellectual Gladiators; every sentence is to ward, or to strike; the contest of smartness is never intermitted; his wit is a meteor, playing to and fro, with alternate corrusions."

decent Stage, speak of it with surprise and astonishment. Voltaire, who is, assuredly, none of the most austere moralists, plumes himself not a little upon the superior bienseance of the French Theatre; and says, that the language of English Comedy is the language of debauchery, not of politeness. M. Moralt, in his Letters upon the French and English Nations, ascribes the corruption of manners in London to Comedy, as its chief cause. Their Comedy, he says, is like that of no other country; it is the school in which the youth of both sexes familiarise themselves with vice, which is never represented there as vice, but as mere gaiety. As for Comedies, says the ingenious M. Diderot, in his observations upon Dramatic Poetry, the English have none; they have, in their place, satires, full indeed of gaiety and force, but without morals, and without taste; sans mœurs et sans gout. There is no wonder, therefore, that Lord Kaims, in his Elements of Criticism, should have expressed himself, upon this subject, of the indelicacy of English Comedy, in terms much stronger than any that I have used; concluding his invective against it in these words: “How odious “ought those Writers to be, who thus spread infec“tion through their native country; employing the “talents which they have received from their Maker
 “most traitorously against Himself, by endeavouring “to corrupt and disfigure his creatures. If the “Comedies of Congreve did not rack him with “remorse in his last moments, he must have been “lost to all sense of virtue.” Vol. II. 479.

I am happy, however, to have it in my power to observe, that of late years, a sensible reformation has begun to take place in English Comedy. We have, at last, become ashamed of making our public entertainments rest wholly upon profligate characters and scenes; and our later Comedies, of any reputation, are much purified from the licentiousness of former times. If they have not the spirit, the ease, and the wit of Congreve and Farquhar, in which respect they must be confessed to be somewhat deficient; this praise, however, they justly merit, of being innocent and moral.

For this reformation, we are, questionless, much indebted to the French Theatre, which has not only been, at all times, more chaste and inoffensive than ours; but has, within these few years, produced a species of Comedy, of still a graver turn than any that I have yet mentioned. This, which is called the Serious or Tender Comedy, and was termed by its opposers La Comedie Larmoyante, is not altogether a modern invention. Several of Terence's Plays, as the Andria, in particular, partake of this character; and as we know that Terence copied Menander, we have sufficient reason to believe that his Comedies, also, were of the same kind. The nature of this composition does not by any means exclude gaiety and ridicule; but it lays the chief stress upon tender and interesting situations; it aims at being sentimental, and touching the heart by means of the capital incidents; it makes our pleasure arise, not so much from the laughter which it excites, as from the tears of affection and joy which it draws forth.

In English, Steele's Conscious Lovers is a Comedy which approaches to this character, and it has always been favourably received by the Public. In French, there are several Dramatic Compositions of this kind, which possess considerable merit and reputation, such as the "Melanide," and "Prejugé à la Mode," of La Chaussée; the "Père de Famille," of Diderot; the "Cénie," of Mad. Graffigny; and the "Nanine," and "L'Enfant Prodigue," of Voltaire.

When this form of Comedy first appeared in France, it excited a great controversy among the Critics. It was objected to as a dangerous and unjustifiable innovation in Composition. It is not Comedy, said they, for it is not founded on laughter and ridicule. It is not Tragedy, for it does not involve us in sorrow. By what name then can it be called? or what pretensions hath it to be comprehended under Dramatic Writing? But this was trifling, in the most egregious manner, with critical names and distinctions, as if these had invariably fixed the essence, and ascertained the limits, of every sort of Composition. Assuredly, it is not necessary that all Comedies should be formed on one precise model. Some may be entirely light and gay; others may be more serious; some may be of a mixed nature; and all of them, properly executed, may furnish agreeable and useful entertainment to the Public, by suiting the different tastes of * men. Serious and tender Comedy has no title to claim to itself the possession of the Stage, to the exclusion of ridicule and gaiety. But when it retains only its proper place, without usurping the province of any other ; when it is carried on with resemblance to real life, and without introducing romantic and unnatural situations, it may certainly prove both an interesting and an agreeable species of Dramatic Writing. If it become insipid and drawling, this must be imputed to the fault of the Author, not to the nature of the Composition, which may admit much liveliness and vivacity.

* "Il y a beaucoup de très bonnes pièces, où il ne règne que de la gayeté; d'autres toutes sérieuses; d'autres mêlées; d'autres, où l'attendrissement va jusqu'aux larmes. Il ne faut donner exclusion à aucun genre; & si l'on me demandoit, quel genre est le meilleur? Je répondrois, celui qui est le mieux traité." VOLTAIRE.

In general, whatever form Comedy assumes, whether gay or serious, it may always be esteemed a mark of Society advancing in true politeness, when those theatrical exhibitions, which are designed for public amusement, are cleared from indelicate sentiment, or immoral tendency. Though the licentious buffoonery of Aristophanes amused the Greeks for a while, they advanced, by degrees, to a chaster and juster taste ; and the like progress of refinement may be concluded to take place among us, when the Public receive with favour, Dramatic Compositions of such a strain and spirit, as entertained the Greeks and Romans, in the days of Menander and Terence.

INDEX

TO THE

TWO VOLUMES.

✻ The Numeral Letters refer to the Volume; and the Figures to the Pages.

A

ACCENTS, thrown farther back from the termination in the English than in any other language, i. 173. Seldom more than one in English words, ii. 163. Govern the measure of English verse, 280.

Achilles, his character in the Iliad, examined, ii. 386.

Action, much used to assist language in an imperfect state, i. 103. And by ancient orators and players, 106. Fundamental rule of propriety in, ii. 176. Cautions with respect to, ibid. In epic poetry, the requisites of, 363.

Acts, the division of a play into five, an arbitrary limitation, ii. 438. These pauses in representation ought to fall properly, 439.

Adam, his character in Milton's Paradise Lost, ii. 422.

Addison, general view of his Essay on the Pleasures of the Imagination, i. 42. His invocation of the muse in his Campaign, censured, 75. Blemishes in his style, 203. 205. 220. Ease and perspicuity of, 226. 228. 232. His beautiful description of light and colours, 279. Instance of his use of mixed metaphor, 298. Improper use of similies, 333. His general character as a writer, 380. Character of his Spectator, 394. Critical examination of some of those papers, 395. Remarks on his criticism of Tasso's Aminta, ii. 303, note. His tragedy of Cato critically examined, 436. 449. 456. 461.

Adjectives, common to all languages, i. 152. How they came to be classed with nouns, 153.

INDEX.

- Adverbs*, their nature and use defined, i. 161. Importance of their position in a sentence illustrated, 203.
- Æneid* of Virgil, critical examination of that poem, ii. 393. The subject, ibid. Action, 394. Is deficient in characters, 395. Distribution and management of the subject, 396. Abounds with awful and tender scenes, 397. The descent of Æneas into hell, 398. The poem left unfinished by Virgil, 396. 400.
- Æschines*, a comparison between him and Demosthenes, i. 499.
- Æschylus*, his character as a tragic writer, ii. 463.
- Ætna*, remarks on Virgil's description of that mountain, i. 71. And on that by Sir Richard Blackmore, 72.
- Affectation*, the disadvantages of, in public speaking, ii. 178.
- Ages*, four, peculiarly fruitful in learned men, pointed out, ii. 201.
- Akenside*, his comparison between sublimity in natural and moral objects, i. 52, note. Instance of his happy allusion to figures, 278. Character of his Pleasures of the Imagination, ii. 317.
- Allegory*, explained, i. 303. Anciently a favourite method of conveying instructions, 304. Allegorical personages improper agents in epic poetry, ii. 376. 418.
- Alphabet* of letters, the considerations which led to the invention of, i. 126. Remote obscurity of this invention, 128. The alphabets of different nations derived from one common source, 128.
- Ambiguity* in style, whence it proceeds, i. 202.
- American* languages, the figurative style of, i. 110. 274.
- Amplification*, in speech, what, i. 346. Its principal instrument, 347.
- Anagnorisis*, in ancient tragedy, explained, ii. 442.
- Ancients* and moderns distinguished, ii. 202. The merits of ancient writers are now finally ascertained, 203. The progress of knowledge favourable to the moderns, in forming a comparison between them, 205. In philosophy and history, 206. The efforts of genius greater among the ancients, 207. A mediocrity of genius now more diffused, 209.
- Annals*, and history, the distinction between, ii. 239.
- Antithesis* in language explained, i. 338. The too frequent use of, censured, 339.
- Apostrophe*, the nature of this figure explained, i. 324. Fine one from Cicero, ii. 12, note.
- Arabian Nights'* Entertainments, a character of those tales, ii. 258.
- Arabian* poetry, its character, ii. 272.
- Arbutnot*, character of his epistolary writings, ii. 254.
- Architecture*, sublimity in, whence it arises, i. 5. The sources of beauty in, 86.
- Arguments*, the proper management of, in a discourse, ii. 134. Analytic and synthetic methods, 137. Arrangement of, 139. Are not to be too much multiplied, 143.
- Ariosto*, character of his Orlando Furioso, ii. 260. 410.
- Aristophanes*, character of his comedies, ii. 484.

INDEX.

- Aristotle*, his rules for dramatic and epic compositions, whence derived, i. 36. His definition of a sentence, 198. His extended sense of the term metaphor, 286. Character of his style, 358. 366. His institutions of rhetoric, 495. His definition of tragedy considered, ii. 427. His observations on tragic characters, 452.
- Arithmetical* figures, universal characters, i. 126.
- Ark* of the covenant, choral service, performed in the procession of bringing it back to Mount Sion, ii. 340.
- Armstrong*, character of his Art of preserving Health, ii. 317.
- Art*, works of, considered as a source of beauty, i. 85.
- Articles*, in language, the use of, i. 138. Their importance in the English language illustrated, 139.
- Articulation*, clearness of, necessity in public speaking, ii. 161.
- Associations*, academical, recommended, ii. 194. Instructions for the regulation of, 195.
- Athenians*, ancient character of, i. 488. Eloquence of, 489.
- Atterbury*, a more harmonious writer than Tillotson, i. 255. Critical examination of one of his sermons, ii. 83. His exordium to a 30th of January sermon, 119.
- Attici* and Asiani, parties at Rome, account of, i. 506.
- Authors*, petty, why no friends to criticism, i. 37. Why the most ancient afford the most striking instances of sublimity, 59. Must write with purity to gain esteem, 176.

B

- Bacon*, his observations on Romances, ii. 257.
- Ballads*, have great influence over the manners of a people, ii. 256. Were the first vehicles of historical knowledge and instruction, 269.
- Bar*, the eloquence of, defined, i. 482. Why more confined than the pleadings before ancient tribunals, 210. Distinction between the motives of pleading at the bar, and speaking in popular assemblies, ii. 29. In what respects ancient pleadings differ from those of modern times, 31. Instructions for pleaders, 33. 129.
- Bards*, ancient, the first founders of law and civilization, ii. 269.
- Barrow*, Dr., character of his style, i. 362. Character of his sermons, ii. 79.
- Beaumont* and Fletcher, their characters as dramatic poets, ii. 490.
- Beauty*, the emotion raised by, distinguished from that of sublimity, i. 78. Is a term of vague application, ibid. Colours 79. Figure, 80. Hogarth's line of beauty, and line of grace, considered, 81. Motion, 82. A landscape the most complete assemblage of beautiful objects, 83. The human countenance, 84. Works of art, 85. The influence of fitness and design in our ideas of beauty, 86. Beauty in literary composition, 87. Novelty, 88. Imitation, 89.

INDEX.

- Bergerus*, a German critic, writes a treatise on the sublimity of Cæsar's Commentaries, i. 56.
- Berkeley*, Bishop, character of his Dialogues on the Existence of Matter, ii. 249.
- Biography*, as a class of historical composition, characterised, ii. 240.
- Blackmore*, Sir Richard, remarks on his description of Mount Ætna, i. 72.
- Blackwall*, his character as a writer, i. 383.
- Boileau*, his character as a didactic poet, ii. 322.
- Bolingbroke*, instances of inaccuracy in his style, i. 216. 236. A beautiful climax from, 231. A beautiful metaphor from, 287. His general character as a politician and philosopher, 288. His general character as a writer, i. 385.
- Bombast* in writing, described, i. 76.
- Bossu*, his definition of an epic poem, ii. 358. His account of the composition of the Iliad, ibid.
- Bossuet*, M., instances of apostrophes to personified objects, in his funeral orations, i. 323, note. Conclusion of his funeral oration on the Prince of Condé, ii. 156.
- Britain*, Great, not eminent for the study of eloquence, i. 515. Compared with France in this respect, 517.
- Bruyere*, his parallel between the eloquence of the pulpit and the bar, ii. 57, note.
- Buchanan*, his character as an historian, ii. 237.
- Building*, how rendered sublime, i. 51.
- C
- Cadmus*, account of his alphabet, i. 129.
- Cæsar's* Commentaries, the style of, characterised, i. 56. Is considered by Bergerus as a standard of sublime writing, ibid. Instance of his happy talent in historical painting, ii. 231, note. His character of Terence the dramatist, 486, note.
- Camoens*, critical examination of his Lusiad, ii. 411. Confused machinery of, 412.
- Campbell*, Dr., his observations on English particles, i. 150, note.
- Carmel*, Mount, metaphorical allusions to, in Hebrew poetry, ii. 345.
- Casimir*, his character as a lyric poet, ii. 311.
- Catastrophe*, the proper conduct of, in dramatic representations, ii. 441.
- Caudinæ Furcæ*, Livy's happy description of the disgrace of the Roman army there, ii. 229.
- Celtic* language, its antiquity and character, i. 164. The remains of it, where to be found, 165. Poetry, its character, ii. 271.
- Characters*, the danger of labouring them too much in historical works, ii. 234. The due requisites of, in tragedy, 450.
- Chinese* language, character of, i. 105. And writing, 125.
- Chivalry*, origin of, ii. 259.
- Chorus*, ancient, described, ii. 430. Was the origin of tragedy,

INDEX.

431. Inconveniences of, 433. How it might properly be introduced on the modern theatre, 434.
- Chronology*, a due attention to, necessary in historical compositions, ii. 219.
- Chrysostom*, St., his oratorical character, i. 514.
- Cibber*, his character as a dramatic writer, ii. 492.
- Cicero*, his ideas of taste, i. 17, note. His distinction between amare and diligere, 190. His observation on style, 200. Very attentive to the beauties of climax, 231. Is the most harmonious of all writers, 242. His remarks on the power of music in orations, 246. His attention to harmony too visible, 254. Instance of his happy talent of adapting sound to sense, 256. His account of the origin of figurative language, 273. His observations on suiting language to the subject, 290. His rule for the use of metaphor, 293. Instance of Antithesis in, 338. The figure of speech called vision, 345. His caution against bestowing profuse ornament on an oration, 351. His distinctions of style, 356. His own character as a writer, 358. His character of the Grecian orators, 492. His own character as an orator, 503. Compared with Demosthenes, 507. Masterly apostrophe in, ii. 12. note. His method of studying the judicial causes he undertook to plead, 34. State of the prosecution of Avitus Cluentius, 41. Analysis of Cicero's oration for him, 42. The exordium to his second oration against Rullus, 114. His method of preparing introductions to his oration, 117. Excelled in narration, 130. His defence of Milo, 131. 141. Instance of the pathetic in his last oration against Verres, 151. Character of his treatise De Oratore, 199. Character of his Dialogues, 248. His epistles, 253.
- Clarendon*, Lord, remarks on his style, i. 212. His character as an historian, ii. 238.
- Clark*, Dr., the style of his sermons characterised, ii. 79.
- Classics*, ancient, their merits not finally settled beyond controversy, ii. 202. The study of them recommended, 211.
- Climax*, a great beauty in composition, i. 230. In what it consists, 347.
- Cluentius*, Avitus, history of his prosecution, ii. 41. His cause undertaken by Cicero, ibid. Analysis of Cicero's oration for him, 42.
- Colours*, considered as the foundation of beauty, i. 79.
- Comedy*, how distinguished from tragedy, ii. 425. 476. Rules for the conduct of, 478. The characters in, ought to be of our own country, and of our own time, ibid. Two kinds of, 479. Characters ought to be distinguished, 481. Style, 482. Rise and progress of comedy, 483. Spanish comedy, 487. French comedy, 488. English comedy, 489. Licentiousness of, from the æra of the restoration, 491. The reformation of, to what owing, 496. General remarks, 498.

INDEX.

- Comparison*, distinguished from metaphor, i. 284. The nature of this figure explained, 329.
- Composition*. See Literary composition.
- Congreve*, the plot of his Mourning Bride embarrassed, ii. 438. General character of this tragedy, 474. His comedies, 493.
- Conjugation* of verbs, the varieties of, i. 157.
- Conviction*, distinguished from persuasion, i. 480.
- Copulatives*, cautions for the use of them, i. 220.
- Corneille*, his character as a tragic writer, ii. 467.
- Couplets*, the first introduction of, into English poetry, ii. 286.
- Cowley*, instances of forced metaphors in his poems, i. 292. His use of similes censured, 336. His general character as a poet, ii. 312.
- Crevier*, his character of several eminent French writers, ii. 191, note.
- Criticism*, true and pedantic, distinguished, i. 8. Its object, 35. Its origin, 36. Why complained of by petty authors, 37. May sometimes decide against the voice of the public, 38.
- Cyphers*, or arithmetical figures, a kind of universal character, i. 126.

D

- David*, King, his magnificent institutions for the cultivation of sacred music and poetry, ii. 338. His character as a poet, 352.
- Debate*, in popular assemblies, the eloquence of, defined, i. 483. More particularly considered, ii. 4. Rules for, ibid.
- Declamation*, unsupported by sound reasoning, false eloquence, ii. 3.
- Declension* of nouns considered, in various languages, i. 145. Whether cases or prepositions were most anciently used, 146. Which of them are most useful and beautiful, 148.
- Deities*, heathen, probable cause of the number of, i. 312.
- Deliberative* orations, what, ii. 1.
- Delivery*, the importance of, in public speaking, ii. 14. 157. The four chief requisites in, 160. The powers of voice, ibid. Articulation, 161. Pronunciation, 163. Emphasis, 164. Pauses, 167. Declamatory delivery, 174. Action, 175. Affectation, 178.
- Demetrius*, Phalerius, the rhetorician, his character, i. 500.
- Demonstrative* orations, what, ii. 1.
- Demosthenes*, his eloquence characterised, i. 489. His expedients to surmount the disadvantages of his person and address, 497. His opposition to Philip of Macedon, ibid. His rivalship with Eschines, 499. His style and action, ibid. Compared with Cicero, 507. Why his orations still please in perusal, ii. 4. Extracts from his Philippics, 17. His definition of the several points of oratory, 157.
- Description*, the great test of a poet's imagination, ii. 322. Selection

INDEX.

- of circumstances, 323. Inanimate objects should be enlivened, 329. Choice of epithets, 332.
- Description* and imitation, the distinction between, i. 91.
- Des Bosses*, his speculations on the expressive power of radical letters and syllables, i. 100. note.
- Dialogue* writing, the properties of, ii. 246. Is very difficult to execute, ibid. Modern dialogues characterised, ibid.
- Didactic* poetry, its nature explained, ii. 313. The most celebrated productions in this class specified, ibid. Rules for compositions of this kind, 314. Proper embellishments of, 316.
- Diderot*, M., his character of English comedy, ii. 495.
- Dido*, her character in the Æneid examined, ii. 396.
- Dionysius* of Halicarnassus, his ideas of excellency in a sentence, i. 243. His distinctions of style, 356. Character of his treatise on Grecian oratory, 494. His comparison between Lysias and Isocrates, 495, note. His criticism on Thucydides, ii. 218.
- Discourse*. See Oration.
- Dramatic* poetry, the origin of, ii. 275. Distinguished by its objects, 425. See Tragedy and Comedy.
- Dryden*, one of the first reformers of our style, i. 365. Johnson's character of his prose style, ibid. note. His character as a poet, ii. 286. His character of Shakespeare, 471, note. His own character as a dramatic writer, 473. 492.
- Du Bos*, Abbé, his remark on the theatrical compositions of the ancients, i. 245.

E

- Education*, liberal, an essential requisite for eloquence, ii. 187.
- Egypt*, the style of the hieroglyphical writing of, i. 124. This an early stage of the art of writing, ibid. The alphabet probably invented in that country, 129.
- Eloquence*, the several objects of consideration under this head, i. 478. Definition of the term, 479. Fundamental maxims of the art, 480. Defended against the objection of the abuse of the art of persuasion, 481. Three kinds of eloquence distinguished, 482. Oratory, the highest degree of, the offspring of passion, ibid. Requisites for eloquence, 485. French eloquence, ibid. Grecian, 487. Rise and character of the rhetoricians of Greece, 490. Roman, 501. The Attici and Asiani, 506. Comparison between Cicero and Demosthenes, 507. The schools of the declaimers, 512. The eloquence of the primitive fathers of the church, 514. General remarks on modern eloquence, ibid. Parliament, 520. The bar, ibid. The pulpit, 521. The three kinds of orations distinguished by the ancients, ii. 1. These distinctions how far correspondent with those made at present, 2. Eloquence of popular assemblies considered, 3. The foundation of eloquence, 4. The danger of trusting to prepared speeches at public meetings, 6. Necessary premeditation pointed out, 7. Method, 8. Style and expression, 9.

INDEX.

- Impetuosity, 10. Attention to decorums, 13. Delivery, 15, 157. Summary, 16. See Cicero, Demosthenes, Oration, and Pulpit.
- Emphasis*, its importance in public speaking, ii. 164. Rule for, 166.
- English* language, the arrangements of words in, more refined than that of ancient languages, i. 117. But more limited, ibid. The principles of general grammar seldom applied to it, 133. The important use of articles in, 138. All substantive nouns of inanimate objects, of the neuter gender, 142. The place of declension in, supplied by prepositions, 146. The various tenses of English verbs, 157. Historical view of the English language, 164. The Celtic the primitive language of Britain, 165. The Teutonic tongue the basis of our present speech, 166. Its irregularities accounted for, 167. Its copiousness, 168. Compared with the French language, ibid. Its style characterised, 170. Its flexibility, 171. Is more harmonious than is generally allowed, ibid. Is rather strong than graceful, 172. Accent thrown farther back in English words than in those of any other language, 173. General properties of the English tongue, ibid. Why so loosely and inaccurately written, 174. The fundamental rules of syntax, common to both the English and Latin, 175. No author can gain esteem if he does not write with purity, 176. Grammatical authors recommended, 177, note.
- Epic* poetry, the standards of, ii. 210. Is the highest effort of poetical genius, 357. The characters, obscured by critics, 358. Examination of Bossu's account of the formation of the Iliad, ibid. Epic poetry considered as to its moral tendency, 361. Predominant character of, 363. Action of, ibid. Episodes, 365. The subject should be of remote date, 368. Modern history more proper for dramatic writing than for epic poetry, ibid. The story must be interesting and skilfully managed, 369. The intrigue, 370. The question considered whether it ought to end successfully, ibid. Duration of the action, 371. Characters of the personages, 372. The principal hero, ibid. The machinery, 373. Narration, 376. Loose observations, 377.
- Episode*, defined with reference to epic poetry, ii. 365. Rules for conduct of, 366.
- Epistolary* writing, general remarks on, ii. 249.
- Eve*, her character in Milton's Paradise Lost, ii. 422.
- Euripedes*, instance of his excellence in the pathetic, ii. 459. note. His character as a tragic writer, 464.
- Exclamations*, the proper use of, i. 343. Mode of their operation, ibid. Rule for the employment of, ibid.
- Exercise* improves both bodily and mental powers, i. 19.
- Exordium* of a discourse, the objects of, ii. 112. Rules for the composition of, 116.
- Explication* of the subject of a sermon, observation on, ii. 132.

INDEX.

F

- Face*, human, the beauty of, complex, i. 84.
- Farquhar*, his character as a dramatic writer, ii. 494.
- Fathers*, Latin, character of their style of eloquence, i. 514.
- Fenelon*, archbishop, his parallel between Demosthenes and Cicero, i. 510. His remarks on the composition of a sermon, ii. 124. Critical examination of his Adventures of Telemachus, 414.
- Fielding*, a character of his novels, ii. 262.
- Figurative* style of language defined, i. 263. Is not a scholastic invention, but a natural effusion of imagination, 264. How described by rhetoricians, 265. Will not render a cold or empty composition interesting, 267. The pathetic and sublime reject figures of speech, 269. Origin of, ibid. How they contribute to the beauty of style, 274. Illustrate description, 277. Heighten emotion, 278. The rhetorical names and classes of figures frivolous, 281. The beauties of compositions not dependent on tropes and figures, 349. Figures must always rise naturally from the subject, 350. Are not to be profusely used, 351. The talent of using derived from nature, and not to be created, 353. If improperly introduced, are a deformity, ibid. note. See Metaphor.
- Figure*, considered as a source of beauty, i. 80.
- Figures* of speech, the origin of, i. 109.
- Figures* of thought, among rhetoricians, defined, i. 265.
- Fitness* and design, considered as sources of beauty, i. 86.
- Fleece*, a poem, harmonious passage from, i. 260.
- Fontenelle*, character of his Dialogues, ii. 249.
- French*, Norman, when introduced into England, i. 165.
- French* writers, general remarks on their style, i. 361. Eloquence, 485. 515. French and English oratory compared, 517.
- Frigidity* in writing characterised, i. 75.

G

- Gay*, a character of his pastorals, ii. 302.
- Gender* of nouns, foundation of, i. 140.
- Genius* distinguished from taste, i. 39. Its import, 40. Includes taste, 41. The pleasures of the imagination, a striking testimony of Divine benevolence, 43. True, is nursed by liberty, 485. In arts and writing, why displayed more in one age than in another, ii. 200. Was more vigorous in the ancients than in the moderns, 207. A general mediocrity of, now diffused, 209.
- Gesner*, a character of his Idylls, ii. 300.
- Gestures*, in public oratory. See Action.
- Gil Blas*, of Le Sage, character of that novel, ii. 261.
- Girard*, Abbé, character of his Synonymes François, i. 195, note.
- Gordon*, instances of his unnatural disposition of words, i. 227.
- Gorgias*, of Leontium, the rhetorician, his character, i. 492.
- Gothic* poetry, its character, ii. 271.

INDEX:

- Gracchus*, C., his declamations regulated by musical rules, i. 245.
- Grammar*, general, the principles of, little attended to by writers, i. 133. The division of the several parts of speech, 134. Nouns substantive, 135. Articles, 138. Number, gender, and case of nouns, 140. Prepositions, 146. Pronouns, 151. Adjectives, 152. Verbs, 154. Verbs, the most artificial and complex of all the parts of speech, 159. Adverbs, 161. Prepositions, and conjunctions, 162. Importance of the study of grammar, 163.
- Grandeur*. See Sublimity.
- Greece*, short account of the ancient republics of, i. 488. Eloquence carefully studied there, 489. Characters of the distinguished orators of, 490. Rise and character of the rhetoricians, 492.
- Greek*, a musical language, i. 106. 244. Its flexibility, 170. Writers distinguished for simplicity, 377.
- Guarini*, character of his Pastor Fido, ii. 302.
- Guicciardini*, his character as an historian, ii. 236.

H

- Habakkuk*, sublime representation of the Deity in, i. 60.
- Harris*, explanatory simile cited from, i. 330.
- Hebrew Poetry*, in what points of view to be considered, ii. 336. The ancient pronunciation of, lost, 337. Music and poetry early cultivated among the Hebrews, 338. Construction of Hebrew poetry, ibid. Is distinguished by a concise, strong, figurative expression, 342. The metaphors employed in, suggested by the climate and nature of the land of Judea, 343. 348. Bold and sublime instances of personification in, 349. Book of Proverbs, 350. Lamentations of Jeremiah, 351. Book of Job, 354.
- Helen*, her character in the Iliad examined, ii. 384.
- Hell*, the various descents into, given by epic poets, shew the gradual improvement of notions concerning a future state, ii. 415.
- Henriade*. See Voltaire.
- Herodotus*, his character as an historian, i. 356. 360.
- Heroism*, sublime instances of, pointed out, i. 51.
- Hervey*, character of his style, i. 372.
- Hieroglyphics*, the second stage of the art of writing, i. 122. Of Egypt, 124.
- Historians*, modern, their advantages over the ancient, ii. 207. Ancient models of, 210. The objects of their duty, 213. Character of Polybius, 216. Of Thucydides, 217. Of Herodotus and Thuanus, 219, 220. Primary qualities necessary in a historian, 221. Character of Livy and Sallust, 222. Of Tacitus, 223. Instructions and cautions to historians, ibid. How to preserve the dignity of narration, 227. How to render it interesting, ibid. Danger of refining too much in drawing character,

INDEX.

234. Character of the Italian historians, 236. The French and English, 237.
- History*, the proper object and end of, ii. 213. True, the characters of, ibid. The different classes of, 214. General History, the proper conduct of, 215. The necessary qualities of historical narration, 217. The propriety of introducing orations in history examined, 233. And characters, ibid. The Italians the best modern historians, 236. See Annals, Biography, Memoirs, and Novels.
- Hogarth*, his analysis of beauty considered, i. 81.
- Homer*, not acquainted with poetry as a systematic art, i. 36. Did not possess a refined taste, 41. Instances of sublimity in, 61. Is remarkable for the use of personification, 317. Story of the Iliad, ii. 379. Remarks on, 380. His invention and judgment in the conduct of the poem, 381. Advantages and defects arising from his narrative speeches, 384. His characters, ibid. His machinery, 386. His style, 388. His skill in narrative description, 389. His similes, 390. General character of his Odyssey, 391. Defects of the Odyssey, 392. Compared with Virgil, 398.
- Hooker*, a specimen of his style, i. 364.
- Horace*, figurative passages cited from, i. 276. Instance of mixed metaphor, i. 298. Crowded metaphors, 299. His character as a poet, ii. 211. 310. Was the reformer of satire, 318.
- Humour*, why the English possess this quality more eminently than other nations, ii. 489.
- Hyperbole*, an explanation of that figure, i. 305. Cautions for the use of, 306. Two kinds of, 307.

I

- Ideas*, abstract, entered into the first formation of language, i. 197.
- Jeremiah*, his poetical character, ii. 353. See Lamentations.
- Iliad*, story of, ii. 379. Remarks on, 380. The principal characters, 384. Machinery of, 386.
- Imagination*, the pleasures of, as specified by Mr. Addison, i. 42. The powers of to enlarge the sphere of our pleasures, a striking instance of Divine benevolence, 43. Is the source of figurative language, 264. 271.
- Imitation*, considered as a source of pleasure to taste, i. 89. And description distinguished, 91.
- Inferences*, from a sermon, the proper management of, ii. 155.
- Infinity* of space, numbers, or duration, affect the mind with sublime ideas, i. 46.
- Interjections*, the first elements of speech, i. 98.
- Interrogations*, instances of the happy use and effect of, i. 342. Mode of their operation, 343. Rule for using, ibid.
- Job*, exemplification of the sublimity of obscurity in the book of, i. 49. Remarks on the style of, ii. 337. The subject and poetry of, 354. Fine passage from, 355.

INDEX.

- Johnson*, his character of Dryden's prose style, i. 365, note. His remarks on the style of Swift, 458, note. His character of Thomson, ii. 325, note. His character of Dryden's comedies, 492, note. His character of Congreve, 494, note.
- Jonson*, Ben, his character as a dramatic poet, ii. 490.
- Isæus*, the rhetorician, his character, i. 495.
- Isaiah*, sublime representation of the Deity in, i. 60. His description of the fall of the Assyrian empire, 327. His metaphors suited to the climate of Judea, ii. 344. 346, 347. His character as a poet, 353.
- Isocrates*, the rhetorician, his character, i. 494.
- Judea*, remarks on the climate and natural circumstances of that country, ii. 344.
- Judicial* orations, what, ii. 1.
- Juvenal*, character of his satires, ii. 318.

K

- Kaimes*, Lord, his severe censure of English comedies, ii. 495.
- Knight errantry*, foundation of the romances concerning, ii. 259.
- Knowledge*, an essential requisite for eloquence, ii. 186. The progress of, in favour of the moderns, upon a comparison with the ancients, 205. The acquisition of, difficult in former ages, 208.

L

- Lamentations* of Jeremiah, the most perfect elegiac composition in the sacred Scriptures, ii. 351.
- Landscape*, considered as an assemblage of beautiful objects, i. 83.
- Language*, the improvement of, studied even by rude nations, i. 2. In what the true improvement of language consists, ibid. Importance of the study of language, 3. Defined, 94. The present refinements of, 95. Origin and progress of, 97. The first elements of, 98. Analogy between words and things, 99. The great assistance afforded by gestures, 103. The Chinese language, 105. The Greek and Roman languages, ibid. Action much used by ancient orators and players, 106. Roman pantomimes, 107. Great difference between ancient and modern pronunciation, 108. Figures of speech, the origin of, 109. Figurative style of American languages, 110. Cause of the decline of figurative language, 112. The natural and original arrangement of words in speech, 115. The arrangement of words in modern languages, different from that of the ancients, 116. An exemplification, 117. Summary of the foregoing observations, 120. Its wonderful powers, 279. All language strongly tinged with metaphor, 285. In modern productions, often better than the subjects of them, 477. Written and oral, distinction between, ii. 191. See Grammar, Style, and Writing.
- Latin* language, the pronunciation of, musical and gesticulating, i. 105. 244. The natural arrangement of words in, 115. The

INDEX.

- want of articles a defect in, 139. Remarks on the words deemed synonymous in, 190.
- Learning*, an essential requisite for eloquence, ii. 187.
- Lebanon*, metaphorical allusions to, in Hebrew poetry, ii. 345.
- Lee*, extravagant hyperbole quoted from, i. 308. His character as a tragic poet, ii. 473.
- Liberty*, the nurse of true genius, i. 485.
- Literary* composition, importance of the study of language, preparatory to, i. 5. The beauties of, indefinite, 87. To what class the pleasures received from eloquence, poetry, and fine writing, are to be referred, 90. The beauties of, not dependent on tropes and figures, 349. The different kinds of, distinguished, ii. 212. See History, Poetry, &c.
- Livy*, his character as an historian; ii. 222. 229.
- Locke*, general character of his style, i. 368. The style of his Treatise on Human Understanding, compared with the writings of Lord Shaftesbury, ii. 245.
- Longinus*, strictures on his Treatise on the Sublime, i. 57. His account of the consequences of liberty, 485. His sententious opinion of Homer's Odyssey, ii. 391.
- Lopez de Vega*, his character as a dramatic poet, ii. 487.
- Love*, too much importance and frequency allowed to, on the modern stage, ii. 454.
- Lowth's English Grammar* recommended, i. 177, note. 221, note. His character of the prophet Ezekiel, ii. 354.
- Lucan*, instance of his destroying a sublime expression of Cæsar, by amplification, i. 65. Extravagant hyperbole from, 309. Critical examination of his Pharsalia, ii. 400. The subject, 401. Character and conduct of the story, 402.
- Lucian*, character of his dialogues, ii. 248.
- Lucretius*, his sublime representation of the dominion of superstition over mankind, i. 50. note. The most admired passages in his Treatise De Rerum Natura, ii. 316.
- Lusiad.* See Camoens.
- Lyric* poetry, the peculiar character of, ii. 305. Four classes of odes, 307. Characters of the most eminent lyric poets, 309.
- Lysias*, the rhetorician, his character, i. 495.

M

- Machiavel*, his character as an historian, ii. 236.
- Machinery*, the great use of, in epic poetry, ii. 373. Cautions for the use of, 375. 386.
- Mackenzie*, Sir George, instance of regular climax in his pleadings, i. 347.
- Man*, by nature both a poet and musician, ii. 268.
- Marivaux*, a character of his novels, ii. 261.
- Marmontel*, his comparative remarks on French, English, and Italian poetry, ii. 283, note.

INDEX.

- Marsy*, Fr., his contrast between the characters of Corneille and Racine, ii. 468, note.
- Massilon*, extract from a celebrated sermon of his, ii. 76, note. Encomium on, by Louis XIV. 82. His artful division of a text, 128.
- Memoirs*, their class in historical composition assigned, ii. 239. Why the French are fond of this kind of writing, ibid.
- Metalepsis*, in figurative language, explained, i. 282.
- Metaphor*, in figurative style, explained, i. 283, 284. All language strongly tinged with, 285. Approaches the nearest to painting, of all the figures of speech, 286. Rules to be observed in the conduct of, 289. See Allegory.
- Metastasio*, his character as a dramatic writer, ii. 470.
- Metonymy*, in figurative style, explained, i. 286.
- Mexico*, historical pictures the records of that empire, i. 122.
- Milo*, narrative of the rencounter between him and Clodius, by Cicero, ii. 131.
- Milton*, instances of sublimity in, i. 48. 67. 70. Of harmony, 241. 259. Hyperbolical sentiments of Satan in, 308. Striking instances of personification in, 317, 318, 319. Excellence of his descriptive poetry, ii. 326. Who the proper hero of his Paradise Lost, 373. Critical examination of this poem, 420. His sublimity characterised, 423. His language and versification, 424.
- Moderns*. See Ancients.
- Moliere*, his character as a dramatic poet, ii. 488.
- Monboddo*, Lord, his observations on English and Latin verse, ii. 280, note.
- Monotony* in language, often the result of too great attention to musical arrangement, i. 253.
- Montague*, Lady Mary Wortley, a character of her epistolary style, ii. 256.
- Montesquieu*, character of his style, i. 358.
- Monumental* inscriptions, the numbers suited to the style, i. 257.
- Moralt*, M., his severe censure of English comedy, ii. 495.
- More*, Dr. Henry, character of his Divine Dialogues, ii. 249.
- Motion*, considered as a source of beauty, i. 82.
- Motte*, M. de la, his observations on lyric poetry, ii. 309, note. Remarks on his criticism on Homer, 391, note.
- Music*, its influence on the passions, ii. 268. Its union with poetry, 269. Their separation injurious to each, 276.

N

- Naïveté*, import of that French term, i. 377.
- Narration*, an important point in pleadings at the bar, ii. 129.
- Night scenes*, commonly sublime, i. 47.
- Nomic* melody of the Athenians, what, i. 245.
- Novels*, a species of writing not so insignificant as may be imagined, ii. 256. Might be employed for very useful purposes, 257. Rise and progress of fictitious history, 258. Characters of the most celebrated romances and novels, 260.

INDEX.

Novelty, considered as a source of beauty, i. 88.

Nouns, substantive, the foundation of all grammar, i. 135. Number, gender, and cases of, 140, 141.

O

Obscurity, not unfavourable to sublimity, i. 49. Of style, owing to indistinct conceptions, 180.

Ode, the nature of, defined, ii. 305. Four distinctions of, 307.

Obscurity and irregularity, the great faults in, 303.

Odyssey, general character of, ii. 391. Defects of, 392.

Oedipus, an improper character for the stage, ii. 452.

Orations, the three kinds of, distinguished by the ancients, ii. 1.

The present distinctions of, 2. Those in popular assemblies considered, 3. Prepared speeches not to be trusted to, 6. Necessary degrees of premeditation, 7. Method, 8. Style and expression, 9. Impetuosity, 10. Attention to decorums, 13.

Delivery, 15. 157. The several parts of a regular oration, 112.

Introduction, ibid. Introduction to replies, 122. Introduction to sermons, 123. Division of a discourse, 124. Rules for dividing it, 126. Explication, 128. The argumentative part, 134. The pathetic, 143. The peroration, 155. Virtue necessary to the perfection of eloquence, 182. Description of a true orator, 185. Qualifications for, 186. The best ancient writers on oratory, 197. 210. The use made of orations by the ancient historians, 233. See Eloquence.

Orators, ancient, declaimed in recitative, i. 106.

Oriental poetry, more characteristic of an age than of a country, ii. 271.

— style of scripture language, i. 111.

Orlando Furioso. See Ariosto.

Ossian, instances of sublimity in his works, i. 63. Correct metaphors, 296. Confused mixture of metaphorical and plain language in, 297. Fine apostrophe in, 325. Delicate simile, 331. Lively descriptions in, ibid.

Otway, his character as a tragic poet, ii. 331.

P

Pantomime, an entertainment of Roman origin, i. 107.

Parables, eastern, their general vehicle for the conveyance of truth, ii. 349.

Paradise Lost, critical review of that poem, ii. 420. The characters in, 421. Sublimity of, 423. Language and versification, 424.

Parentheses, cautions for the use of them, i. 215.

Paris, his character in the Iliad, examined, ii. 385.

Parliament of Great Britain, why eloquence has never been so powerful an instrument in, as in the ancient popular assemblies of Greece and Rome, i. 520.

INDEX.

Parnel, his character as a descriptive poet, ii. 326.

Particles, cautions for the use of them, i. 221. Ought never to close sentences, 234.

Passion, the source of oratory, i. 483.

Passions, when and how to be addressed by orators, ii. 144. The orator must feel emotions before he can communicate them to others, 148. The language of, 149. Poets address themselves to the passions, 264.

Pastoral poetry, enquiry into its origin, ii. 287. A three-fold view of pastoral life, 289. Rules for pastoral writing, 290. Its scenery, 292. Characters, 294. Subjects, 297. Comparative merits of ancient pastoral writers, 299. And of moderns, 300.

Pathetic, the proper management of, in a discourse, ii. 143. Fine instance of, from Cicero, 151.

Pauses, the due uses of, in public speaking, ii. 167. In poetry, 169. 281.

Pericles, the first who brought eloquence to any degree of perfection, ii. 490. His general character, 491.

Period. See Sentence.

Persius, a character of his Satires, ii. 318.

Personification, the peculiar advantages of the English language in, i. 142. Limitations of gender in, 143. Objections against the practice of, answered, 311. The disposition to animate the objects about us, natural to mankind, 312. This disposition may account for the number of heathen divinities, ibid. Three degrees of this figure, 313. Rules for the management of the highest degree of, 320. Caution for the use of, in prose compositions, 322. See Apostrophe.

Perspicuity, essential to a good style, i. 171. Not merely a negative virtue, 180. The three qualities of, 181.

Persuasion, distinguished from conviction, i. 480. Objection brought from the abuse of this art, answered, 481. Rules for,

ii. 3.

Peruvians, their method of transmitting their thoughts to each other, i. 124.

Petronius Arbiter, his address to the declaimers of his time, i. 512.

Pharsalia. See Lucan.

Pherecydes of Scyros, the first prose writer, i. 113.

Philips, character of his pastorals, ii. 301.

Philosophers, modern, their superiority over the ancient, unquestionable, ii. 206.

Philosophy, the proper style of writing adapted to, ii. 243. Proper embellishments for, 244.

Pictures, the first essay toward writing, i. 121.

Pindar, his character as a lyric poet, ii. 310.

INDEX.

- Pitcairn, Dr.*, extravagant hyperbole cited from, i. 310.
- Plato*, character of his dialogues, ii. 247.
- Plautus*, his character as a dramatic poet, ii. 485.
- Pleaders* at the bar, instructions to, ii. 32. 129.
- Pliny's Letters*, general character of, ii. 252.
- Plutarch*, his character as a biographer, ii. 241.
- Poetry*, in what sense descriptive and in what imitative, i. 91. Is more ancient than prose, 112. Source of the pleasure we receive from the figurative style of, 317. Test of the merit of, 335. Whence the difficulty of reading poetry arises, ii. 169. Compared with oratory, 181. Epic, the standards of, 210. Definition of poetry, 264. Is addressed to the imagination and the passions, ibid. Its origin, 266. In what sense older than prose, ibid. Its union with music, 268. Ancient history and instruction first conveyed in poetry, 269. Oriental, more characteristic of an age than of a country, 271. Gothic and Celtic, ibid. Grecian, 272. Origin of the different kinds of, 273. Was more vigorous in its first rude essays than under refinement, 275. Was injured by the separation of music from it, 276. Metrical feet, invention of, 278. These measures not applicable to English poetry, 279. English heroic verse, the structure of, 280. French poetry, 281. Rhyme and blank verse compared, 283. Progress of English versification, 285. Pastorals, 287. Lyrics, 305. Didactic poetry, 313. Descriptive poetry, 322. Hebrew poetry, 336. Epic poetry, 357. Poetic characters, two kinds of, 372. Dramatic poetry, 425.
- Pointing*, cannot correct a confused sentence, i. 215.
- Politics*, the science of, why ill understood among the ancients, ii. 221.
- Polybius*, his character as an historian, ii. 216.
- Pope*, criticism on a passage in his Homer, i. 66. Prose specimen from, consisting of short sentences, 200. Other specimens of his style, 227. 237. Confused mixtures of metaphorical and plain language in, 295. Mixed metaphor in, 299. Confused personification, 321. Instance of his fondness for antitheses, 341. Character of his epistolary writings, ii. 254. Criticism on, 255. Construction of his verse, 282. Peculiar character of his versification, 286. His pastorals, 297. 301. His ethic epistles, 320. The merits of his various poems examined, ibid. Character of his translation of Homer, 388.
- Precision* in language, in what it consists, i. 183. Requisites to, 196. The importance of, 202.
- Prepositions*, whether more ancient than the declension of nouns by cases, i. 146. Whether more useful than beautiful, 148.
- Dr. Campbell's observations* on, 150, note. Their great use in speech, 162.
- Prior*, allegory cited from, i. 303.
- Pronouns*, their use, varieties, and cases, i. 151. Relative instances,

INDEX.

- illustrating the importance of their proper position in a sentence, 205.
- Pronunciation*, distinctness of, necessary in public speaking, ii. 162. Tones of, 171.
- Proverbs*, book of, a didactic poem, ii. 350.
- Psalms* xviii. sublime representation of the Deity in, i. 59. lxxxth, a fine allegory from, 303. Remarks on the poetic construction of the Psalms, ii. 339. 346.
- Pulpit*, the eloquence of, defined, i. 483. English and French sermons compared, 517. The practice of reading sermons in England disadvantageous to oratory, 521. The art of persuasion resigned to the Puritans, ibid. Advantages and disadvantages of pulpit eloquence, ii. 56. Rules for preaching, 60. The chief characteristics of pulpit eloquence, 63. Whether it is best to read sermons, or deliver them extempore, 73. Pronunciation, ibid. Remarks on French sermons, 74. Cause of the dry argumentative style of English sermons, 77. General observations, 80.
- Pysistratus*, the first who cultivated the arts of speech, i. 490.

Q

- Quintilian*, his ideas of taste, i. 17, note. His account of the ancient division of the several parts of speech, 135, note. His remarks on the importance of the study of grammar, 163. On perspicuity of style, 179. 189. On climax, 230. On the structure of sentences, 235. Which ought not to offend the ear, 246. 251. His caution against too great an attention to harmony, 254. His caution against mixed metaphor, 297. His fine apostrophe on the death of his son, 325. His rule for the use of similes, 336. His directions for the use of figures of style, 352. His distinctions of style, 356. 370. His instructions for good writing, 388, 389. His character of Cicero's oratory, 505. His instructions to public speakers for preserving decorums, ii. 13. His instructions to judicial pleaders, 34. His observations on exordiums to replies in debate, 122. On the proper division of an oration, 125. His mode of addressing the passions, 148. His lively representation of the effects of depravity, 184. Is the best ancient writer on oratory, 198.

R

- Racine*, his character as a tragic poet, ii. 467.
- Ramsay*, Allan, character of his Gentle Shepherd, ii. 304.
- Rapin*, P., remarks on his parallels between Greek and Roman writers, i. 109.
- Retz*, Cardinal de, character of his memoirs, ii. 240.
- Rhetoricians*, Grecian, rise and character of, i. 492.
- Rhyme*, in English verse, unfavourable to sublimity, i. 66. And blank verse compared, ii. 284. The former, why improper in

INDEX.

- the Greek and Latin languages, 285. The first introduction of couplets in English poetry, 286.
- Richardson*, a character of his novels, ii. 263.
- Ridicule*, an instrument often misapplied, ii. 476.
- Robinson Crusoe*, character of that novel, ii. 262.
- Romance*, derivation of the term, ii. 259. See Novels.
- Romans*, derived their learning from Greece, i. 501. Comparison between them and the Greeks, 502. Historical view of their eloquence, ibid. Oratorical character of Cicero, 503. Era of the decline of eloquence among, 511.
- Rousseau*, Jean Baptiste, his character as a lyric poet, ii. 312.
- Rowe*, his character as a tragic poet, ii. 474.

S

- Sallust*, his character as an historian, ii. 222.
- Sannazarius*, his piscatory eclogues, ii. 300.
- Satan*, examination of his character in Milton's Paradise Lost, ii. 420.
- Satire*, poetical, general remarks on the style of, ii. 318.
- Saxon* language, how established in England, i. 165.
- Scenes*, dramatic, what, and the proper conduct of, ii. 445.
- Scriptures*, sacred, the figurative style of, remarked, i. 111. The translators of, happy in suiting their numbers to the subject, 257. Fine apostrophe in, 326. Present us with the most ancient monuments of poetry extant, ii. 336. The diversity of style in the several books of, ibid. The Psalms of David, 339. No other writings abound with such bold and animated figures, 343. Parables, 349. Bold and sublime instances of personification in, ibid. Book of Proverbs, 350. Lamentations of Jeremiah, 351.
- Scuderi*, Madam, her romances, ii. 261.
- Seneca*, his frequent antitheses censured, i. 340. Character of his general style, 361. ii. 245. His epistolary writings, 250.
- Sentence* in language, definition of, i. 198. Distinguished into long and short, ibid. A variety in, to be studied, 200. The properties essential to a perfect sentence, 202. A principal rule for arranging the members of, 203. Position of adverbs, ibid. And relative pronouns, 205. Unity of a sentence, rules for preserving, 210. Pointing, 215. Parentheses, ibid. Should always be brought to a perfect close, 216. Strength, 218. Should be cleared of redundancies, 220. Due attention to particles recommended, 221. The omission of particles sometimes connects objects closer together, 223. Directions for placing the important words, 226. Climax, 230. A like order necessary to be observed in all assertions or propositions, 232. Sentences ought not to conclude with a feeble word, ibid. Fundamental rule in the construction of, 238. Sound not to be disregarded, 239. Two circumstances to be attended to for

INDEX.

- producing harmony in, 240. 249. Rules of the ancient rhetoricians for this purpose, 243. Why harmony much less studied now than formerly, 244. English words cannot be so exactly measured by metrical feet as those of Greek and Latin, 247. What is required for the musical close of a sentence, 252. Unmeaning words introduced merely to round a sentence, a great blemish, 253. Sounds ought to be adapted to sense, 255.
- Sermons*, English, compared with French, i. 517. Unity an indispensable requisite in, ii. 63. The subject ought to be precise and particular, 64. The subject not to be exhausted, 65. Cautions against dryness, 67; and against conforming to fashionable modes of preaching, 69. Style, 70. Quaint expressions, 72. Whether best to be written or delivered extempore, 73.
- Delivery, ibid. Remarks on French sermons, 74. Cause of the dry argumentative style of English sermons, 78. General observations, 80. Remarks on the proper divisions of, 125. Conclusion, 155. Delivery, 157.
- Seigné, Madam de*, character of her Letters, ii. 256.
- Shaftesbury, Lord*, observations on his style, i. 186. 201. 213. 227. 229. 255. 301. His general character as a writer, 382.
- Shakespeare*, the merit of his plays examined, i. 39. Was not possessed of a refined taste, 41. Instance of his improper use of metaphor, 292. 297. Exhibits passions in the language of nature, ii. 459. His character as a tragic poet, 471. As a comic poet, 490.
- Shenstone*, his pastoral ballad, ii. 302.
- Shepherd*, the proper character of, in pastoral description, ii. 294.
- Sheridan*, his distinction between ideas and emotions, ii. 172, note.
- Sherlock, Bishop*, fine instance of personification cited from his sermons, i. 315. A happy allusion cited from his sermons, ii. 71. note.
- Silius Italicus*, his sublime representation of Hannibal, i. 53, note.
- Simile*, distinguished from metaphor, i. 284. 329. Sources of the pleasure they afford, ibid. Two kinds of, 330. Requisites in, 332. Rules for, 334. Local propriety to be adhered to in, 337.
- Simplicity*, applied to style, different senses of the term, i. 374.
- Smollet*, improper use of figurative style, cited from, i. 290. note.
- Solomon's Song*, descriptive beauties of, ii. 330.
- Songs*, Runic, the origin of Gothic history, ii. 270.
- Sophists* of Greece, rise and character of, i. 492.
- Sophocles*, the plots of his tragedies remarkably simple, ii. 497. Excelled in the pathetic, 459. His character as a tragic poet, 464.

INDEX.

- Sorrow*, why the emotions of, excited by tragedy, communicate pleasure, ii. 443.
- Sounds*, of an awful nature, affect us with sublimity, i. 46. Influence of, in the formation of words, 98.
- Speaker*, public, must be directed more by his ear than by rules, i. 249.
- Spectator*, general character of that publication, i. 394. Critical examination of those papers that treat of the pleasures of imagination, 395.
- Speech*, the powers of, the distinguishing privilege of mankind, i. 1. The grammatical division of, into eight parts, not-logical. 135. Of the ancients, regulated by musical rules, 245.
- Strada*, his character as an historian, ii. 237.
- Style*, in language defined, i. 178. The difference of, in different countries, ibid. The qualities of a good style, 179. Perspicuity, ibid. Obscurity, owing to indistinct conceptions, 180. Three requisite qualities in perspicuity, 181. Precision, 183. A loose style, from what it proceeds, 185. Too great an attention to precision renders a style dry and barren, 196. French distinction of style, 199. The characters of, flow from peculiar modes of thinking, 354. Different subjects require a different style, 355. Ancient distinctions of, 356. The different kinds of, 357. Concise and diffusive, on what occasions proper, 358. Nervous and feeble, 362. A harsh style, from what it proceeds, 363. Era of the formation of our present style, 364. Dry manner described, 366. A plain style, ibid. Neat style, 368. Elegant style, 369. Florid style, 370. Natural style, 373. Different senses of the term simplicity, 374. The Greek writers distinguished for simplicity, 377. Vehement style, 384. General directions how to attain a good style, 387. Imitation dangerous, 391. Style not to be studied to the neglect of thoughts, 392. Critical examination of those papers in the Spectator that treat of the pleasures of the imagination, 395. Critical examination of a passage in Swift's writings, 459. General observations, 476. See Eloquence.
- Sublimity* of external objects, and sublimity in writing, distinguished, i. 44. Its impressions, 45. Of space, ibid. Of sounds, 46. Violence of the elements, ibid. Solemnity bordering on the terrible, 47. Obscurity not unfavourable to, 49. In building, 50. Heroism, 51. Great virtue, 52. Whether there is any one fundamental quality in the sources of sublime, 53.
- Sublimity* in writing defined, i. 56. Errors in Longinus pointed out, 57. The most ancient writers afford the most striking instances of sublimity, 59. Sublime representation of the Deity in Psalm xviii. ibid. And in the prophet Habakkuk, 60. In Moses and Isaiah, ibid. Instances of sublimity in Homer, 61. In Ossian, 63. Amplification injurious to sublimity, 64. Rhyme in English verse unfavourable to, 66. Strength essential to sublime writing, 68. A proper choice of circumstances essen-

INDEX.

- tial to sublime description, 70. Strictures on Virgil's description of Mount Ætina, 71. The proper sources of the sublime, 72. Sublimity consists in the thought, not in the words, 74. The faults opposed to the sublime, 77.
- Sully*, Duke de, character of his Memoirs, ii. 240.
- Superstition*, sublime representation of its dominion over mankind from Lucretius, i. 50, note.
- Swift*, observations on his style, i. 182. 196. 214. 235. 255. General character of his style, 367. Critical examination of the beginning of his proposal for correcting, &c. the English tongue, 459. Concluding observations, 476. His language, ii. 192. Character of his epistolary writing, 254.
- Syllables*, English, cannot be so exactly measured by metrical feet, as those of Greek and Latin, i. 247.
- Synecdoche*, in figurative style, explained, i. 283.
- Synonymous* words, observations on, i. 189.

T

- Tacitus*, character of his style, ii. 210. His character as an historian, 223. His happy manner of introducing incidental observations, 224. Instance of his successful talent in historical painting, 232. His defects as a writer, 233.
- Tasso*, a passage from his Gierusalemme distinguished by the harmony of numbers, i. 259. Strained sentiments in his pastorals, ii. 295. Character of his Aminta, 302. Critical examination of this poem, 406.
- Taste*, true, the uses of, in common life, i. 11. Definition of, 15. Is more or less common to all men, 16. Is an improveable faculty, 18. How to be refined, 20. Is assisted by reason, 21. A good heart requisite to a just taste, 22. Delicacy and correctness the characters of perfect taste, 23. Whether there be any standard of taste, 26. The diversity of, in different men, no evidence of their tastes being corrupted, 27. The test of, referred to the concurring voice of the polished part of mankind, 32. Distinguished from genius, 39. The sources of pleasure in, 43. The powers of, enlarge the sphere of our pleasures, 44. Imitation, as a source of pleasure, 89. Music, ibid. To what class the pleasures received from eloquence, poetry, and fine writing, are to be referred, 89.
- Telemachus*. See Fenelon.
- Temple*, Sir William, observations on his style, i. 186. Specimens, 199. 213. 217. 222. 250. His general character as a writer, 379.
- Terence*, beautiful instance of simplicity from, i. 378. His character as a dramatic writer, ii. 486.
- Terminations* of words, the variations of, in the Greek and Latin languages, favourable to the liberty of transposition, i. 119.
- Theocritus*, the earliest known writer of pastorals, ii. 288. His talent in painting rural scenery, 292. Character of his pastorals, 299.

INDEX.

- Thomson*, fine passage from, where he animates all nature, i. 318. Character of his Seasons, ii. 324. His eulogium, by Dr. Johnson, 325, note.
- Thuanus*, his character as an historian, ii. 220.
- Thucydides*, his character as an historian, ii. 217. Was the first who introduced orations in historical narration, 232.
- Tillotson*, archbishop, observations on his style, i. 186. 208. 249. 292. General character of, as a writer, 378.
- Tones*, the due management of, in public speaking, ii. 171.
- Topics*, among the ancient rhetoricians, explained, ii. 135.
- Tragedy*, how distinguished from comedy, ii. 425. More particular definition of, 426. Subject and conduct of, 428. Rise and progress of, 430. The three dramatic unities, 435. Division of the representation into acts, 438. The catastrophe, 441. Why the sorrow excited by tragedy communicates pleasure, 443. The proper idea of scenes, and how to be conducted, 445. Characters, 450. Higher degrees of morality more inculcated by modern than by ancient tragedy, 453. Too great use made of the passion of love on the modern stages, 454. All tragedies expected to be pathetic, 455. The proper use of moral reflections in, 460. The proper style and versification of, 461. Brief view of the Greek stage, 463. French tragedy, 466. English tragedy, 470. Concluding observations, 474.
- Tropes*, a definition of, i. 265. Origin of, 269. The rhetorical distinctions among, frivolous, 280.
- Turnus*, the character of, not favourably treated in the Æneid, ii. 396.
- Turpin*, archbishop of Rheims, a romance writer, ii. 260.
- Typographical* figures of speech, what, i. 344.
- V
- Vanburgh*, his character as a dramatic writer, ii. 493.
- Verbs*, their nature and office explained, i. 155. No sentence complete without a verb expressed or implied, ibid. The tenses, 156. The advantage of English over the Latin in the variety of tenses, 157. Active and passive, 158. Are the most artificial and complex of all the parts of speech, 159.
- Verse*, blank, more favourable to sublimity than rhyme, i. 67. Instructions for the reading of, ii. 169. Construction of, 283.
- Virgil*, instances of sublimity in, i. 48. 69. 71. Of harmony, 260, 261. Simplicity of language, 268. Figurative language, 282. 314. 325. Specimens of his pastoral descriptions, ii. 290, note. 296. Character of his Pastoral, 299. His Georgics, a perfect model of didactic poetry, 314. The principal beauties in the Georgics, 316. Beautiful descriptions in his Æneid, 331. Critical examination of that poem, 393. Compared with Homer, 399.
- Virtue*, high degrees of, a source of the sublime, i. 52. A necessary ingredient to form an eloquent orator, ii. 182.

INDEX.

- Vision*, the figure of speech so termed, in what it consists, i. 345.
Unities, dramatic, the advantages of adhering to, ii. 435. Why the moderns are less restricted to the unities of time and place than the ancients, 447.
Voice, the powers of, to be studied in public speaking, ii. 160.
Voiture, character of his epistolary writings, ii. 255.
Voltaire, his character as an historian, ii. 242. Critical examination of his Henriade, 416. His argument for the use of rhyme in dramatic compositions, 462. His character as a tragic poet, 469.
Vossius, Joannes Gerardus, character of his writings on eloquence, ii. 196.

W

- Waller*, the first English poet who brought couplets into vogue, ii. 286.
Wit, is to be very sparingly used at the bar, ii. 39.
Words, obsolete and new coined, incongruous with purity of style, i. 181. Bad consequences of their being ill chosen, 183. Observations on those termed synonymous, 189. Considered with reference to sound, 241.
Words and things, instances of the analogy between, i. 99.
Writers of genius, why they have been more numerous in one age than in another, ii. 200. Four happy ages of, pointed out, 201.
Writing, two kinds of, distinguished, i. 121. Pictures the first essay in, ibid. Hieroglyphics the second, 122. Chinese characters, 125. Arithmetical figures, 126. The considerations which led to the invention of an alphabet, 127. Cadmus's alphabet, the origin of that now used, 128. Historical account of the materials used to receive writing, 130. General remarks, 131. See Grammar.

Y

- Young*, Dr., his poetical character, i. 301. Too fond of antitheses, 340. The merit of his works examined, ii. 321. His character as a tragic poet, 474.

THE END.

LATELY PUBLISHED

BY T. CADELL AND W. DAVIES, STRAND.

1. SERMONS. By Hugh Blair, D.D. one of the Ministers of the High Church, and Professor of Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres in the University of Edinburgh. 5 vols. 8vo. Price 1*l.* 10*s.* in boards, or in royal 18mo. price 1*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* in boards.

* * * Another Edition, elegantly printed in 5 vols. royal 8vo. with a Portrait of the Author. Price 3*l.* in boards.

2. THE PHILOSOPHY OF RHETORIC. By George Campbell, D.D. F.R.S. Edin. Principal of Marischall College, Aberdeen. A New Edition, with the Author's last Additions and Corrections. In 2 vols. 8vo. Price 18*s.* in boards.

3. AN INTRODUCTION TO THE CRITICAL STUDY AND KNOWLEDGE OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES. By Thomas Hartwell Horne, A.M. handsomely printed, in 3 large vols. 8vo. illustrated with Maps and Fac-Similes of Biblical Manuscripts. Price 2*l.* 2*s.* in boards.

This Work, on which the Author has been engaged for many years, is offered to Bible Readers generally, and to the Clergy and those preparing for Holy Orders in particular, as a Manual of what is most valuable in Biblical Criticism, selected from the labours of the most eminent Critics, both British and Foreign. It is divided into three parts, viz.

Part I. comprises a concise View of the Geography of Palestine, and of the Political, Religious, Moral, and Civil State of the Jews; illustrating the principal Events recorded in the Bible.

Part II. presents a copious Investigation of the Principles of Scripture Interpretation, and their Application to the Historical, Prophetical, Typical, Doctrinal, and Moral Parts of the Sacred Writings.

Part III. is appropriated to the Analysis of the Bible; including an Account of the Canon of Scripture; together with Critical Prefaces and Synopses to each book, upon an improved Plan.

An APPENDIX is subjoined, containing an Account of the Principal MSS. and Editions of the Old and New Testaments, and other Bibliographical and Critical Information relative to the Holy Scriptures.

Books lately published by T. Cadell and W. Davies, Strand.

4. THE ELEMENTS OF CRITICISM. By the Hon. Henry Home, of Kaimes. One of the Senators of the College of Justice. Eighth Edition. In 2 vols. 8vo. Price 16s. in boards.

5. A FAMILIAR SURVEY OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION, and of HISTORY, as connected with the Introduction of Christianity, and with its Progress to the present time. Intended primarily for the Use of Young Persons of either Sex, during the Course of Public or Private Education. By Thomas Gisborne, A.M. Sixth Edition, 8vo. Price 10s. 6d. in boards.

6. THE WORKS OF THE RIGHT HON. JOSEPH ADDISON. A New Edition, with Notes by Richard Hurd, D.D. Lord Bishop of Worcester. Handsomely printed. In 6 vols. 8vo. Price 3*l.* 12s. in boards. A few Copies on large paper, price 5*l.* 8s. in boards.

7. THE PRINCIPLES OF MORAL AND POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY. By William Paley, D.D. Archdeacon of Carlisle. New Edition, in 2 vols. 8vo. Price 12s. in boards.

8. A VIEW OF THE EVIDENCES OF CHRISTIANITY. By William Paley, D.D. New Edition, in 2 vols. 8vo. Price 12s. in boards.

9. HORÆ PAULINÆ, or the Truth of the Scripture History of St. Paul, evinced by a comparison of the Epistles which bear his name with the Acts of the Apostles, and with one another. By William Paley, D.D. New Edition. Price 8s. in boards.

10. NATURAL THEOLOGY OR EVIDENCES OF THE EXISTENCE AND ATTRIBUTES OF THE DEITY. Collected from the Appearances of Nature. By William Paley, D.D. New Edition. Price 9s. in boards.

PE
1402
B6
1819
v.2

Blair, Hugh
Lectures on rhetoric and belles letters 13th ed.

PLEASE DO NOT REMOVE CARDS OR SLIPS FROM THIS POCKET

UNIVERSITY OF TORONTO LIBRARY
